ment. The noble earl shook his head; but he (Earl L.) knew only of one plan of relief for an over-population, but it was one on which he was not much disposed, in that place, to desecant. He was glad, however, that the noble earl had openly declared that he expected little good from that part of the bill which went to afford relief to parishes; and it ought to be known, that such was the noble earl's opinion of that part of his own measure, that the proprietors in parishes might not be blamed for not giving that relief, which, in reality, was not intended by Government to be given. The only object of the bill, therefore, was to grant these Exchequer Bills to speculators in public works; but the better proceeding would be, to put an end to that project also, by ordering the bill to be read a third time this day three months.

The bill was then read a third time and passed without amendment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 10.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] Mr. J. Smith moved, "that a Select Committee be appointed to consider of the Bankrupt Laws, and of the operation thereof."

The motion was agreed to, and the following members were appointed to form the Committee:—Mr. J. Smith, Mr. Solicitor-General, Mr. Ponsonby, Sir S. Romilly, Mr. Alderman Atkins, Mr. Courtenay, Mr. J. Abercromby, Mr. Bolland, Mr. Barnett, Mr. Wrottesley, Mr. L. Foster, Mr. J. Martin, Sir J. Newport, Mr. Finlay, Mr. Protheroe, Sir J. Lubbock, Mr. Marryat, Mr. Irving, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. B. Shaw, and Mr. W. Smith.

Sir J. Newport then presented a petition of merchants, bankers, and traders of Waterford, Belfast, Cork, Dublin, Limerick, and Kilkenny, for the revision of the bankrupt laws.—Referred to the Committee.

EXTENTS IN AID.] Mr. W. Smith moved for a Select Committee "to inquire into the mode of issuing Extents in Aid, the nature of the process, its effects, and the expediency of regulating or of discontinuing the same."

Sir M. W. Ridley seconded the motion, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer supported it. The right hon. gentleman said, he wished the whole question to be fully and impartially considered. His sole object was, to secure the rights of the Crown, without violating those of the subject.

The following members were then appointed, and all petitions presented this session, regarding Extents in Aid, were ordered to be referred to them:—Mr. W. Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Dowdeswell, Mr. Casberd, Mr. Lushington, Sir C. Morgan, Sir J. Newport, Mr. Collett, Mr. H. Martin, Sir J. Shaw, Mr. Eacon, Mr. Sergeant Onslow, Mr. S. Thornton, Mr. H. Davis, Sir M. Kidley, Mr.

Huskisson, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Irving, Mr. Finlay, Mr. Gurney, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Grenfell, Mr. J. Smith, Mr. Birch, and Mr. Littleton.

The Extents in Aid Bill was then read a second time, and committed for Friday, the 20th of June.

CIVIL SERVICES RECOMPENSE BILL.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up the report of this bill.

Mr. Calcraft said he would move the amendment of which he had given notice, after the hon. gentleman had proposed his amended clauses.

Mr. D. Gilbert explained the nature and extent of the clauses he meant to propose.

Mr. Tierney begged to trouble the House with a few observations on this measure. He had taken great pains to understand the subject, and after the most mature deliberation, he thought that a compensation ought to be granted to the Crown for those means of rewarding public services of which it would be deprived by the abolition of sinecures. The only question was, regarding the mode and amount of such compensations. He strongly objected to that part of the measure which made length of service a criterion of merit. If so, did any body suppose that three years spent in a cabinet office were sufficient to entitle the individual to a cabinet pension? Besides, what reason was there for making a difference between the period of their service, and that of those who held inferior situations? This measure was spoken of as one of economy; but its economy to the nation would not at least be felt for a considerable time. In the first place, it might create a greater expenditure. At the end of two years, Government would have at its disposal pensions to the amount of 11,000*l.*; while, perhaps, not one of the sinecures would fall in to the public relief. At the end of four years, 18,000*l.* of pensions might be given away without any proportionate compensation to the country in the abolition of useless places. This bill, with these objections against it, had passed through the House without much opposition, precisely because confidence was placed in the Committee from which it originated; but which, from the little attention it bestowed upon the subject of its inquiry, did not deserve any confidence. There was no evidence in the Report to shew the policy of the measures it recommended, or to point out the saving that would accrue to the public. The House was required to vote 42,000*l.* to the Crown, and to take the chance of what might be gained by the falling in of sinecures. The whole of the abolished places, leaving out of view those that were regulated with diminished salaries, amounted only to 57,000*l.* and the pensions created would amount to 42,000*l.*, leaving only 15,000*l.* of saving. There were 20 places abolished of considerable emolument, the salaries of which amounted to 41,000*l.*, the rest being of smaller value. The utmost advantage the public could derive from this bill, therefore, was 15,000*l.*; and this saving might not be realized for many years, while the commencement of the measure would actually create additional expenditure. (Hear.) He objected likewise to the manner in which the offices to be abolished were described in the Report, which prevented them from being properly understood. It would appear that the idea of abolishing some of them had only lately been approved of. He asked the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) what he thought of abolishing sinecures last January? (Hear.) He should like to know his notions of the policy of this measure when he gave away the office of Lord Registrar of Scotland, when he created a vested interest of 1500*l.* a year in that sinecure? (Hear.) In some cases the compensation was greater than the original sinecure. In the Exchequer, for instance, there were three places abolished, which yielded, as now regulated, 17,800*l.*; and pensions in lieu of these were to be voted to this department amounting to 18,500*l.* He could not but regard this measure, therefore, as a gross delusion upon the public (hear); as a trick from which the country would gain nothing, and whose only result would be an increase of the national burdens and ministerial patronage. (Hear.) If the Ministers had the good fortune to stick to their places for four years, they would have at their disposal 18,000*l.* They made no question about the falling in of sinecures: they only thought of the increase of their patronage. (Hear, hear.) He was of opinion, that no pension should be conferred till the consolidated fund had the benefit of the falling in of an equivalent sinecure salary. The bill ought to be sent back to the Committee (though he placed no great reliance on them) to be amended. There was nothing pressing in the measure at present; nothing was to be saved to the country; the patronage of the Crown would be increased rather than diminished by it. He stated these objections; but he should not ground any motion upon them. A triumphant answer might be expected from the noble lord (hear, hear); but he could not disprove figures: he could not shew that more than 15,000*l.* would remain after subtracting 42,000*l.* from 57,000*l.*; and this sum was all that the public would gain at the end of twelve years, when this scheme came into full operation. He had already stated that the auditor and the four tellers of the Exchequer, with the Clerk of the Pells, had salaries to the amount of 17,800*l.*, and the officers of this department might be entitled by the present bill to pensions amounting to 18,000*l.* He had no reluctance to remunerate meritorious civil officers, but the measure should be carried into effect in a way that, under pretence of economy and of a saving to the public, should not increase the public burdens or ministerial patronage.

Lord Castlereagh animadverted in rather strong terms on the observations of the right hon. gent. It was somewhat strange, he said, that the right hon. gentleman should have been so long silent, if he really relied on the deductions of his own reasoning; and that he had suffered two bills to pass, and to be carried up to the Lords, without opposition, which were much more objectionable in every point of view than the present. The right hon. gentleman had said, that he had taken pains to understand the objects and policy of the bill. He (Lord C.) fully admitted that he had taken great pains upon the subject, but it was pains to misrepresent it. (Hear.) It appeared extraordinary in the right hon. gentleman, when he saw a measure adopted agreeable to the country, and promising the most beneficial results, that he should come forward to excite a popular prejudice against it, and should exert his fancy and his reasoning, and expend his dexterity and his jokes, to render it contemptible or disgusting. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman had acted unfairly in leaving out the savings that would fall in from the abolition of the offices in Ireland; which, though they were not yet abolished by bills brought into the House, would certainly be so. This was a most important omission when calculating the amount of the future balance to the public from the present measures. The compensation was given in lieu of all the offices, and the right hon. gentleman had compared its amount with the aggregate salaries of only a part. He had said, that in two years 11,000*l.* of pensions would accrue to the Crown from this bill, and in four years 18,000*l.* This statement he (Lord C.) denied. Without including the supernumerary pensions which would be placed at the disposal of the Crown, only 5500*l.* would be placed in the power of Government at the end of the first two years—namely, one pension of 3000*l.*, one of 1500*l.*, and one of 1000*l.*, and at the end of four years only 13,000*l.* There was no probability that the 42,000*l.* which was the amount of the pension list created by this bill, would ever be in complete operation at the same time. The charge of 90,000*l.* was probably the extent to which it would go. The right hon. gent. had, however, taken the pensions at the highest, and the sinecures at the lowest estimate, exaggerating in the one case, and omitting in the other. Did the right hon. gentleman mean to condemn his own measure? Did he think it superior to the present? was it restricted to a certain sum like the present? and did he now wish to turn his back upon that which he had formerly supported? When that bill was introduced by his own friends, although its compensations were much more alarming than the present, it was extolled as purity itself—it was esteemed an emanation of wisdom—it was praised as the quintessence of patriotism; yet that measure would have enabled the Crown to grant pensions to an unlimited amount, and without any restriction as to the time of commencement or length of service. By that bill, the Administration might have pensioned every member of the Cabinet, a liberality to which he (Lord C.) objected at the time. The right hon. gentleman had treated his friends very cruelly by opposing this bill on the ground of economy. If it was not economical, how extravagant was the measure he formerly supported! He could conceive no other object which the right hon. gentleman had in view, by disgusting the House and the country with the observations he had delivered, but to make a speech; as he proposed no amendment, and concluded with no motion. (Hear, hear.) Why did he not oppose the proceeding in the Committee? Why did he not state his opinions earlier? or, why did he now state them at all? Had he turned his back on his old friends? His opposition, he hoped, would have no effect against the adoption of a measure of undeniable economy; manifesting a sincere desire to meet the reasonable wishes of the people by a great sacrifice of patronage, and an important retrenchment of expenditure. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calcraft supported the bill, as a measure both economical and agreeable to the country. He thought it would effect a great saving, and that, without a compensation, it could not be expected that the abolition of sinecures would be assented to by the Crown. He conceived, however, that a further reduction might be made in the pension list, which could be applied towards the pensions created by this bill. He then moved the following clause, as an amendment:—"That any person who may accept a pension under this Act, shall vacate his seat in Parliament."

Mr. Canning objected to the clause. He observed, that when a member accepted office, he was sent back to his constituents, because he placed himself in a situation to be influenced by the Crown, and they were entitled to say, whether they would afterwards intrust him with the support of their interests: but a pension of this kind was a vested interest which made the holder of it independent.

Mr. Ponsonby said, the great objection was, that the bill, while it pretended to abolish sinecures, would, in fact, give an equivalent to the Crown, without giving any equivalent to the people. (Hear.)

Mr. Wood insisted that there was a great distinction between the absolute disposal of sinecures hitherto vested in the Crown, and the power of giving pensions for services actually performed, and fairly brought before the notice of the public.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer followed up the argument of the last speaker, observing, that sinecures might be given, whether deserved or not; but that the pension could not be conferred, except for certain definite services. The pension would be like the half-pay in the army or navy—a reward for regular professional exertions.

Mr. Gordon said, he must protest against the analogy of the right hon. gentleman, which was too much in the principle of a trading speculation. The tendency of such a principle would be to degrade public men into mere political speculators. As to the particular clause, it seemed to him advisable, that when a public servant was rewarded for his public services, the constituent should have an opportunity of expressing how far that reward had been honourably deserved. (Hear.)

The House divided upon the clause, and it was negatived by a majority of 64 to 27.

It was then moved, that "this bill be read a third time to-morrow."

Lord Milton rose, and insisted that the House had the power, if it chose, of curtailing any prerogative of the Crown which it might deem unnecessary, and was not bound to furnish any compensation. The Crown could not receive any money except from the people, and for their benefit; and it was competent for the representatives of the people to control or take away this power.

Mr. Robinson said, he was surprised that the hon. gentlemen on the other side should have kept back their constitutional objections till this late stage of the bill. As to any man looking towards this remote pension as a bribe, he did not believe that there would be much competition for such a prize. It must be, as indeed it ought to be, a hopeless speculation in a pecuniary point of view.

Mr. Gordon differed from the right hon. gentleman: he thought that the very limitation of the rewards would excite a keener competition. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition, and laughter from the Ministerial benches.) Any person at all acquainted with commercial speculations knew well, that a great prize or two awakened a keener appetite than many small ones. (Hear.) This bill would, for the first time, make politics a trade; a circumstance the more to be regretted at a time when the public were not disposed to look with peculiar favour on official men of whatever party. As to the argument about the necessity of remunerating men who left lucrative professions, he conceived that it would be better if such persons remained in their profession, if gain was their object, and if they could not be contented with the higher honour of being called to assist the Sovereign with advice for the benefit of the people. Much had been said about the services rendered to the country by the labours of Ministers. For his own part, he thought that instances might arise when Ministers might do much more good by resigning than by keeping their places. But the paltry temptations of the present bill would tend to keep Ministers in till they had carried their pension by length of service. Thus it was possible to imagine (he was of course merely putting a case), that at some future time there might be serious divisions in the Cabinet on some question of even vital importance, and that some particular Minister might be subjected to some disagreeable slight on that account; and such a man might by the present bill be induced to cling to the office which he would otherwise reject. He might say, "Well, this is very unpleasant: but let me wait a little longer, and then I shall have a pension to console these indignities. Meantime, let 'bear and forbear' be my maxim: Quid- quid erit: superanda omnis fortuna ferendo est." (A laugh.)

Mr. Robinson explained.

Mr. Hammersley said, that the power of the House of Commons was at an end, if it could not take away any unnecessary and hurtful prerogative from the Crown without supplying an indemnification.

Sir R. Heron thought the bill highly objectionable in the present bankrupt state of the country. He conceived that the Crown had sufficient means of rewarding its servants out of the old pension list.

The House divided on the question of the third reading—

Ayes . . 75 | Noes . . 20 | Majority . . 55.

GRANT TO THE LATE SPEAKER.] On the Report of the resolution for giving a pension of 4,000*l.* to the late Speaker, an amendment was proposed, to substitute 3,000*l.* for 4,000*l.*; but it was negatived, and a bill was ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Castlereagh, &c.

ORDNANCE RESOLUTIONS.] The Report of these Resolutions was brought up. On the motion that it be agreed to,

Sir R. Fergusson rose, and objected to the present mode of relieving the artillery on foreign stations. The same troops had been on service in Jamaica for 27 years, and on inquiry, he found, that the evil extended to other colonies. The best remedy would be to relieve this species of troops by battalions, instead of sending out detachments to keep up their numbers. He objected also to the modern office of Adjutant-General of Artillery, as expensive, and intrusted with too much power.

Mr. F. Lewis, after complimenting the Finance Committee, proceeded to animadvert on the mode in which the Ordnance Board used to charge for gunpowder, by first charging for the saltpetre, and then for the manufactured powder. That Board, he observed, had always been more profuse and extravagant than any other. He contended, that a distinct pledge should be given that the same abuse should not occur in future; and said, that the Board should be controlled by the Minister of Finance, as was recommended by the Finance Committee. The whole plan should be estimated and submitted to that Minister before it was undertaken. He complained that very heavy expenses had been charged under the head called "unprovided services," which ought to comprise nothing except what could not possibly be foreseen.

Mr. R. Ward concurred in all the hon. gentleman had said. A memoir had been presented to the Finance Committee, by which the Ordnance Board was pledged to charge for gunpowder in a different way; the hon. gentleman had a little exaggerated the former mode of charging. No work would be undertaken in future, except after a due estimate of the whole, controlled by the Minister of Finance. Nothing would be comprised under the head of unprovided services but what could not possibly be foreseen.

Lord Milton complained, that the Ordnance Board had been in the habit of diverting sums of money from the services for which they were voted. Sir Edward Seymour had been impeached for this in the time of Charles II., and the House should watch the Board strictly.

Mr. W. Smith, commenting on the pledge that had been given, hoped the House would not rest upon that alone. Had any individual acted as the Board had done in the sale of powder, terms too strong could not be applied to his conduct. The greatest inaccuracies had prevailed in the accounts of the Board; and when they affected to be exact even to halfpence, there was a deficiency of thousands.

Mr. Tremayne hoped the Board would be placed under control: he thought the present works on the lines of Plymouth quite useless, and wished to know if there was any vote for them.

Mr. R. Ward said, it appeared by the memoir presented to the Committee of Finance, that the outworks had been given up; the estimate for the lines had been 150,000*l.*, and though they were necessary to protect Plymouth on the land side, yet even that was abandoned, and all the Master-General of the Ordnance required was, such a sum as would complete a gap between the old works and the new—about 20,000*l.*

Mr. W. Smith observed, that if the principles maintained were pushed to their full extent, there would be no difficulty in getting money by way of estimates, which might be applied to any other purpose. He thought this a delinquency, but not a corrupt one.

Mr. Tremayne explained. He considered the wall at Plymouth useless without the works, which were abandoned, and the whole would cost 800,000*l.* The Committee recommended no expense beyond necessary repairs; he imputed no malversation.

Mr. R. Ward said, he was satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. D. Gilbert complimented the Board of Ordnance on having done its duty in an ample manner; but there had been an irregularity in the way of keeping the accounts. Monies assigned to particular objects ought not to be diverted to others, unless in cases of clear necessity, which could afterwards be shewn. There were cases in the military department which might require advances, and it might be proper to make allowance for them.

The whole of the resolutions were agreed to, with the exception of the vote for the British Museum, which was ordered to be further considered on Thursday.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR LAW.] A Bill was ordered to be brought in by Sir J. Chetwode and

Mr. Littleton, "for the more easy and cheap recovery of certain small simple contract Debts, with the power of ordering Payment by Instalments in certain cases, in England."—It was presented accordingly, and read a first time.

[USURY LAWS.] The following petition of Merchants, Manufacturers, and Traders of the town of Belfast, presented to the House on the 5th instant, was ordered to be printed.—"That your petitioners have, with feelings of regret, observed, that leave has been given by the House to bring a Bill into Parliament for the repeal of the existing laws against Usury, and feeling assured that such a measure would tend materially to injure the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests of the United Kingdom, they would therefore most humbly hope and pray that the House will not sanction the repeal of those salutary laws under which the people of these countries have arisen to an eminence unequalled, and their property has found such protection; they therefore beg leave to submit that, in their estimation of the laws which have from time to time been deemed necessary by the wisdom of the Legislature for the protection of our Manufactures, Commerce, and Agriculture, none are more deserving of gratitude than those now in force against usurious transactions, the repeal of which would, they humbly conceive, increase the present distresses of the Empire, benefit the monied Interest alone, and tend to the injury of every other class of society; they therefore pray the House for the continuance of those protecting laws under which the country has hitherto flourished in its Commerce and Manufactures, and which afford the best security to the proprietors of landed and other fixed property."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, June 11.

The Irish Savings Banks Bill, was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, it was ordered, that the House should proceed with causes to-morrow; the place for the Court of Chancery being at present employed for purposes connected with the State Trials. (It was used as a waiting-room for the witnesses.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 11.

The Lord Mayor of London (Matthew Wood, Esquire) was sworn in as one of the Representatives of that City, (in the place of Mr. Alderman Combe) and took his seat in his robes.

Mr. Wrottesley, Mr. Harvey, and Mr. Evan Baillie, were added to the Committee on Ex-tents in Aid.

[USURY LAWS.] The following petition of inhabitants of Belfast, presented to the House on the 3d instant, was ordered to be printed. "That the petitioners have learned, with great satisfaction, that the House have determined to take into their serious consideration the laws now existing, which limit the interest of money by severe restrictive penalties; the petitioners, confident that this subject will receive from the House all the attention and deliberation due to its great importance, would have deemed it unnecessary to intrude the expression of their feelings, had not a portion of their townsmen, who hold different opinions, determined to lay before the House a memorial, the prayer of which is contrary to the wishes, and adverse to the sentiments, of the petitioners; the petitioners therefore humbly beg leave to express their conviction that the arguments in favour of the repeal of those restrictions rest on the basis of equity and enlightened policy, and that those which are urged on behalf of their continuance are founded on contracted views, formed under the influence and prejudices of habit, and at variance with those enlarged and liberal principles of political economy which have naturally kept pace with an improving state of society; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the House will be pleased to adopt such measures as may cause the existing restrictions to cease at as early a period as in their wisdom may be deemed compatible with the general interests of the State, and the existing engagements of individuals."

[SAVINGS BANKS.] The Irish Savings Banks Bill was read a third time, and passed.

[PERSONS COMMITTED FOR TREASON.] Lord Felkestone, in pursuance of his notice, rose and moved, "That an humble Address be presented to H. R. H. the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a list of all persons now in confinement in Great Britain, by warrant of either of the Secretaries of State, or of six Privy Councillors, detained under the provisions of an act, passed in this present session of Parliament, 'for enabling his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government;' specifying the names of the persons so confined, their trades, professions, or occupations, their ages, the places of their confinement, the places where arrested, and the dates of their arrest and commitment; and also the name or names of the persons who signed the commitment."—The noble lord observed, that if any opposition should be made to this motion, on the ground that the number of persons in custody was small, he should think it an argument against suspending the liberties of the whole country for the crimes of a few; if the number was great, he should consider it an argument against intrusting power to individuals who thus abused it, by filling the gaols at a time when the country was in a state of profound tranquillity. He called for ages, because, as he had been informed, some very young persons had been committed; and he thought a knowledge of their rank and circumstances was very important, as the Habeas Corpus Act had never before been suspended unless some parties of power and consequence were implicated in designs against the Government. He had himself been prevented, by the orders of the Secretary of State, from seeing the prisoners confined in Reading gaol: but he inquired, and found, that of the three persons there, one named Knight, who was said to be the most troublesome of all, because he had addressed letters to the gaoler, was a poor and needy individual; and if not a lunatic already, which seemed to be the case from his letters, would probably soon become so in consequence of long confinement alone. The other two persons were declared by the gaoler to be the most harmless and inoffensive men he had ever met with: the one a journeyman cutler, the other a journeyman tailor (a laugh): neither of them able to read or write, and almost without clothes to their backs. These were the formidable conspirators for whom we were to suspend all the liberties of the country! (Hear, hear.) He thought it important to call for an account of the places where individuals had been arrested, as there were many cases of hardship and oppression incurred by removals to distant districts; and these men in Reading gaol had been sent thither from Manchester; so that, needy as they were, not a friend could relieve their wants—circumstances of great aggravation in the exercise of this dangerous and arbitrary power. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. H. Addington, in the absence of the noble Secretary of State, said, he had no objection to agree to a motion for the numbers, ages, and places of confinement of the persons who had been committed; but he submitted to the noble lord himself, whether any object would be attained, and whether it would not be detrimental to the parties themselves, to give their names. As to the letters written by Knight, in Reading gaol, the letter which had been sent to his wife containing a petition, but of which she was unable to pay the postage, had been forwarded to the Home office, and thence to the individual for whom it was intended. The noble lord ought to consider the great burden thrown on Ministers in the execution of the purposes of the act, and that, if they failed to commit a suspicious person, they were quite as responsible as if they committed an innocent individual.

Sir F. Burdett thought it necessary to make some observations, because acts of arbitrary power were every day creeping in unnoticed, and at a time when there was not the shadow of a pretence for any departure from the established laws. He therefore hoped the noble lord would not alter his motion, or cease to seek for information on the actions of an Administration, assuming, as he believed, an authority they did not legally possess, even under the powers granted by the late act; and sending persons away to distant prisons, to aggravate all the evils of confinement. He recollected, that when a motion similar to the present was made in the year 1797, the House did not refuse a list of the names, though it was then urged, that if Ministers abused the authority vested in them, they would be liable to the penalty of an impeachment. However, when the act expired, a bill of indemnity passed, which shewed that the Ministry had at least been acting culpably enough, and much more so than the persons who had been their victims. Whatever pretences might be made about plots and conspiracies, there never was any reason for excluding the unfortunate men who were now undergoing their trial below, from all intercourse with the rest of the world; and the doing so was a gross violation of the confidence which the House had placed in Ministers. The right hon. gentleman had talked of the responsibility of Ministers, and of the burdens thrown upon them, and the sufferings of gentlemen in office, instead of reflecting on the sufferings of their victims, while the noble Secretary of State was perhaps at that moment riding in the Park, though ample notice had been given of the motion. On a subject so important, his non-attendance was a great disrespect to the House, and a gross neglect of duty; but if the noble lord had been present, he could not have given the shadow of a reason why a list of the names should be refused. With respect to the case of Knight, did the House consider what solitary confinement was? Did they recollect that insanity was its frequent consequence? If these men were innocent, and if the Secretary of State, who ought to have no manner of concern with the confinement of a criminal, interfered and directed the mode of it, which was done only under the most despotic governments, this was an additional reason for persisting to call for the names.

Mr. Canning, after inquiring whether the noble lord (Folkestone) was disposed to acquiesce in the proposal that had been made by his right hon. friend (Mr. H. Addington), and being answered in the negative, said, that the speech of the hon. baronet had been directed to a motion long since disposed of, on the burdens which the House had been pleased to lay on Ministers under the act enabling his Majesty to imprison such persons as he suspected of disaffection. (A laugh.) The hon. baronet had not attempted to shew on fair parliamentary grounds that this power had been abused, but he had endeavoured to persuade the House to lament its decision, and to express an unfounded distrust, which would give sedition new spirit and courage at a moment the most critical that could be imagined. Did any man pretend to believe that the mischief had abated? Was it not notorious that on that very day intelligence had been received of fresh plans of disturbance? Instead, however, of contributing to assist in the suppression of these evils, the noble lord (if he persevered in his motion) and the hon. baronet wished to induce the House to concur with them in declaring that the power originally given to Government for that purpose was monstrous, that it had been grossly abused, and that it ought to be recalled. He had no objection to give the number, the ages, and the places of confinement of the persons who had been imprisoned; but to give their names, would be to afford useful intelligence to the disaffected throughout the country, and to make Parliament the medium of the communication. He should therefore move as an amendment, to limit the motion to a return of the number of persons confined, their ages, and the places of their confinement.

Mr. Ponsonby protested that he could see little difference between the original motion and the amendment, and ridiculed the notion that to communicate the names of the persons who were confined, would afford any encouragement or available information to the disaffected.

Mr. B. Bathurst contended that the disclosure of the names might be attended with great mischief.

Sir W. Burroughs observed, that the calendars at the approaching Assizes must disclose the name of every prisoner in all the gaols in the country. Why then should the right hon. gentleman resist the noble lord's motion? It was important to ascertain, before the discussion on the proposed renewal of the Suspension, whether among the persons confined there was a single man of property or connections, as that consideration must operate materially on the question. It was the duty of that House jealously to watch every proceeding of the Executive Government.

The House divided on the original question.

Ayes '53, Noes 104.—The amendment was then agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS.] Mr. C. Dundas presented a petition of freeholders of Berkshire, against the renewal of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

Lord Folkestone said, it was signed at one of the largest meetings known at Reading, and on a day which was not a market-day. There had been previously a strong attempt at opposition by what was called the Pitt Club, but it had no effect on the general opinion and feeling; and only two hands were held up against the petition.

After a few words from Mr. S. Lefevre, it was ordered to lie on the table.

GUERNSEY.] Mr. Bennet moved an address for a "copy of the Report made by the commissioners directed to inquire into the jurisprudence of the island of Guernsey; also a copy of the commission, and the names of the commissioners, and the expenses of the same."

Mr. B. Bathurst opposed the motion, as inquiry had been made, and was still proceeding in a way which he hoped would terminate satisfactorily. The island, he observed, was jealous concerning its privileges.

Mr. Bennet remarked, that really the island paid no taxes; at least, comparatively speaking. The motion was negatived without a division.

BOROUGH REPRESENTATION.] Sir F. Burdett said, he had a petition to present, which related to abuses that had been but too frequently complained of; it was from John Greenway, a voter of the borough of Haslemere, and the contents of it must shew to every man the nature of the boroughmongering system, which was so adverse to constitutional principles, to true morality, and to every sound feeling. The petitioner stated, that Lord Lonsdale had conveyed to him a certain property, on which he was to vote in that borough, as, what was familiarly called a faggot vote. These faggots, it appeared, returned the two members to the House of Commons. But this man said, that he had a scruple of conscience about delivering up the property which had been conveyed to him, and which he had sworn at the election to be his own. In consequence of this, he stated, that he had met with vindictive persecution; and after various modes of attack, had been served with an ejectment. It seemed impossible for the House, if they received this petition, not to take some steps upon it. People were on their trial in the courts below on charges of treason, and it was impossible that the House could shut their eyes to a question which involved the worst of treasons. Offences of this description led inevitably to ingratitude, to perjury, to the injury of the public morals, and to the detriment of every sacred feeling of honour and of conscience. It was, after all, only a miniature representation of the general evils of the boroughmongering system, against which the dissatisfaction of the people was loudly expressed, and which dissatisfaction Ministers wished to put down. He believed that what they called treason arose from the abuses of this unconstitutional and nefarious system. The public knew well enough, that by law no person could interfere with, or nominate, a member of the House of Commons. They also knew that there was a resolution on the journals of that House, that it was a high breach of the privileges of that House, as the representatives of the people of England, if a peer interfered in the election of a commoner. The case stated in the petition, contained every ingredient that was disgusting, and unconstitutional, in which he might say, by way of parody, that "every devil had set his seal to give the world assurance of a fiend." He should merely move that the petition be brought up, and then read.

Mr. Bankes wished to know more particularly the grievances complained of in the petition, and its prayer.

Sir F. Burdett said, that the grievance related to the mode of electing members of that House. The prayer was for the affording of redress as far as the House might think meet.—He was proceeding to read the petition, when Mr. Bankes rose again, and observed, that if the petitioner complained of a vindictive spirit exercised against him, it was matter for a court of law. In that case, he did not think it a sort of petition that ought to be received.

Sir F. Burdett said, that if the House could not afford relief, yet it was a matter which concerned their own privileges.

Mr. Bankes would not enter into the question of the competency of the House; but he thought that the petition should have been tendered at a more proper period, as a considerable time had passed since the election and the circumstances which had been stated.

Mr. Brand said, as he understood the matter, a Committee sat on the election, and the petitioner had been a sort of agent or engine of the noble lord who nominated to this borough. The petitioner swore to the property conveyed to him, and had kept it; and it did not appear, from all the circumstances, that he had a much earlier opportunity of stating his case. The contents of the petition involved a question as to the use of burgage tenures. The practice in such matters was to correct the evil immediately. He felt it incumbent on the House to take some measures in this case; but how could the whole of it be known, unless they heard the petition read?

Mr. B. Bathurst did not see how the House could take up the question, so as to decide upon it. A Committee of the House had seated the two members. Would it be contended that this was wrong? In fact it was, if any thing, a legal question. The hon. bart. could say no more than that the petitioner had a legal title to his conveyed property; but that he had been served with an ejectment. The courts of law must decide whether he had a bonâ fide property, or vice versa.

Sir H. Parnell observed, that he knew a case in which a man was called upon to return conveyed property the day after his vote. The conveyance was made to him by the agent of a peer who nominated for the borough.

Mr. P. Moore desired an opportunity of judging of the merits by hearing the petition read.

Mr. W. Smith protested against the doctrine, that a member was not entitled to read from a petition in the course of his speech. He remembered a good deal about the mode of presenting petitions: and what the presenter should or should not say on such occasions. It had been said that the member should have read the petition, and seen that there was nothing in it improper. The House was always in a state of embarrassment on questions of this sort. If the allegations of the petition, as far as they had been mentioned, were true, they told facts which were alike anomalous to the law of the land and the constitution of that House. A freeholder or voter should be so bonâ fide. This petition shewed the contrary. Yet when the subject of burgage tenure came before the House, they all felt that men had freehold or other property made over to them fraudulently, and for a particular purpose. According to an old saying of Mr. Lee, the qualification of property was nothing more than a piece of parchment, with a seal dangling at the end of it. This was to convey a bonâ fide right to the temporary occupier; but how did the question stand in common sense and law, when the conveying party brought his ejectment? The man to whom the property was made had it, or had it not. The man appeared to be persecuted, because he would not give up what was made over to him. Here the House were in their accustomed embarrassment on such occasions. It would be better to enact something to establish the right of burgage tenures intelligibly, for the return of members, than to leave them as they are. They were now disgracefully covered with a cloak and a concealment. This shewed the absolute necessity of some Reform. He had nothing to do with the petitioner's conscience. (A laugh.) While these boroughs existed, it seemed good that now and then these faggots, as they were called, should come under the notice of Parliament.

The Speaker observed, that he believed it to be contrary to uniform practice, for a member to read a petition, which he wished to present. He might, however, state the substance of it. It did not become him to say a word farther; other matters must rest with the House.

Mr. Cuswen hoped the House would not be unwilling to hear the petition read. It stated some things which went against the honour and dignity of the House of Commons, out of which some measures might spring that might be of importance to the character of the House for its own vindication. The public discontent certainly arose in some part, from an idea of the improper construction of that House.—He did not see how the petition could be refused.

Sir R. Fergusson observed, that no objection was taken against the Berkshire petition, though it contained strong allegations. The House, he thought, would not consult its own dignity, by refusing to receive the present petition.

Sir F. Burdett said, he could have introduced the petition in another way certainly; but he was not at all surprised at the feelings that had been manifested. He was not astonished at the disposition shewn by gentlemen opposite, who perhaps were returned in a similar way; nor at the speech of the hon. member for Corfe Castle (Mr. Bankes). It was natural to wish to avoid a discussion on practices too detestable to be defended within those walls; but it seemed to him impossible to pass over facts which were in defiance of the Statute Law, the Constitution, and every thing else that was valuable or sacred.—The petition involved a charge against a peer of the realm, for an interference in the election of a representative of the people in the Commons' House of Parliament; and for his having made a fraudulent conveyance to attain his object, which tended to the commission of perjury. To put the whole in a small compass, the transaction appeared to be fraudulent and unconstitutional, and fit for the House to consider. The public, however, would not shut their eyes on this case: and if the petition was received, he might probably move some measure upon it.

The House divided on the question of receiving the petition,

Thursday, June 12.

Farther evidence was given on Miller's Divorce Bill.—Proceedings postponed till tomorrow.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] At one o'clock, the Earl of Liverpool laid on the table a green bag, containing farther information on the subject of traitorous practices. The papers were referred to the Secret Committee.—At five o'clock the Earl of Harrowby presented the Report of the Committee, which was read by the Clerk at the table, as follows:—

REPORT,

By the Lords Committees appointed to take into consideration the several Papers sealed up in a Bag, and delivered by command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and to report to the House; and to whom were referred several other Papers sealed up in a Bag, also delivered by command of his Royal Highness:

ORDERED TO REPORT,

That the Committee have met, and proceeded in the examination of the Papers referred to them.

It is their painful duty to report, that these Papers afford but too many proofs of the continued existence of a traitorous conspiracy for the overthrow of our established Government and Constitution, and for the subversion of the existing order of Society.

The attempts of the conspirators have indeed hitherto been frustrated by the active exertions of the Government, and particularly of the Magistrates in different parts of the country, in execution both of the general laws provided for the maintenance of the public tranquillity, and of the special powers recently given by Parliament for that purpose; but the information contained in the Papers referred to the Committee, leaves no doubt in their minds, that the same wicked and desperate designs are still actively pursued. The information from which they have drawn this painful conclusion, appears to have been collected from many various sources, often unconnected with and unknown to each other; but it is uniform in its general result, and it is corroborated by a striking correspondence in many minute particulars.

This intelligence must be considered as resting in many of its parts, upon the depositions and communications of persons, who either are themselves, more or less, implicated in these criminal transactions, or who have apparently engaged in them, but with a view of obtaining information, and imparting it to the Magistrates or to the Secretary of State.

The testimony of persons of both these descriptions must always be in some degree questionable; and your Committee have seen reason to apprehend, that the language and conduct of some of the latter may, in some instances, have had the effect of encouraging those designs, which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting. After making, however, to the best of their judgment, all due allowance for these circumstances, the Committee are fully persuaded that the following is a correct and not exaggerated statement of the result of the information which has been brought under their view.

The Papers relate almost exclusively to the principal manufacturing districts in some of the midland and northern counties of England; and although the disaffected in the country appear still to be looking to the metropolis with the hope of assistance and direction, it is to the parts of the country above referred to, that the more recent projects of insurrection seem to have been confined.

The Committee think it their duty here to remark, that although in many of these districts particular causes of distress have no doubt operated to expose the minds of the labouring classes of the community to irritation and perversion, yet they are persuaded that this distress must for the most part be considered rather as the instrument than as the cause of disaffection. In some of the places where these practices have prevailed, they believe the want of employment to have been less felt than in many other parts of the kingdom; while in other places, where the pressure has been perhaps most grievous, it has certainly been sustained with a spirit of patience, loyalty and good order, which cannot be too highly commended. And your Committee cannot refrain from expressing their opinion, that it is chiefly by the means pointed out in the Report of the former Committee, by the widely extended circulation of seditious and blasphemous publications, and by the effect of inflammatory discourses continually renewed, that this spirit has been principally excited and diffused. By these the attachment to our established Government and Constitution, and the respect for law, morality, and religion, have gradually been weakened among those whose situations most exposed them to this destructive influence: and it is thus that their minds have been prepared for the adoption of designs and measures no less injurious to their own interests and happiness than to those of every other class of his Majesty's subjects.

Since the period of the former Report, Manchester and its neighbourhood have (as far as your Committee has seen) been the only places where meetings have been convened and assembled sufficiently numerous to create immediate apprehensions for the public tranquillity. At a meeting, which was convened there on the 3d of March for the purpose of petitioning against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and where several thousand persons appear to have been assembled, it was proposed and agreed to, that another meeting should be held on the following Monday, viz. the 10th of March, with the professed intention that ten out of every twenty persons who should attend it should proceed to London with a petition to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

The interval was employed in almost daily meetings of the disaffected, which were numerous attended. The real intentions of the leaders were there developed to their followers in speeches of the most undisguised violence. One of them avowed that he was a republican and a leveller, and would never give up the cause till a republican form of government was established. The people were told by others, that if their petition was rejected, they must force it: that the large towns in Yorkshire were adopting the same plan, and would meet them on the road, or at least march at the same time to London: that there was reason to believe that the Scotch were then on their march: that they should be one hundred thousand strong, when joined by the people of other manufacturing places upon the road; and that it would be impossible for the army or any thing else to resist them. These speakers appear in a few instances to have been checked by some of their associates, but their sentiments were for the most part received with strong marks of applause and concurrence.

Arrangements for the march were also pointed out at these meetings. It was recommended to those who intended to join in it to provide themselves with blankets, shoes, and knapsacks, as well as with money and food. Those who remained to work were to assist with their subscriptions. Every ten men were to choose one for a leader; and one was to be set over every hundred. Strong intimations were also given of the propriety and necessity of their providing themselves with arms; but these do not appear to have been acted upon, except perhaps in a few instances.

On the 10th of March the proposed meeting took place, to the amount, as is supposed, of from 10,000 to 12,000 persons at the least. Although some of their leaders had been previously arrested, and others were apprehended on the spot, the purpose was not abandoned; and large numbers of these deluded people marched off towards London.

A considerable body of them was stopped on the road to Stockport; some hundreds are stated to have passed through Leek; and one party proceeded as far as Ashbourne; but the activity of the magistrates in dispersing the meeting, and in stopping the progress of these bodies, effectually prevented the execution of a design which could not probably have failed to disturb the peace of the counties through which so numerous an assemblage was to have passed; and which, if prosecuted to its full extent, must have led to consequences highly dangerous to the public tranquillity.

The discomfiture of this attempt does not, however, appear to have materially discouraged those who have planned it; their measures were uninterruptedly pursued. Within a very short time after this failure, fresh meetings were held in smaller numbers; they were composed either wholly or in part of delegates from the neighbourhood of Manchester, from the borders of Derbyshire, and from the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire. At some of these meetings reports were made of the quantity of pikes, of firelocks, and of bullets which could be provided for the intended rising. Communications were held about this time with Nottingham, Sheffield, and Birmingham by delegates, who were to give intelligence of the plans in contemplation, to excite the people of those places to similar attempts, and to ascertain the state of preparation to which they had advanced. In these proceedings the pretence of Parliamentary Reform appears to have been almost wholly discarded; they evidently point to nothing short of revolution; and it affords a dreadful proof of the extent to which the minds of many of those who attended these meetings have been inflamed and corrupted, that in public speeches the necessity of doing away with, or disposing of, (as they term it) the persons most obnoxious to them, has often been openly and unreservedly announced; and that on one occasion it is stated to have been proposed that Manchester should be made a Moscow, for the purpose of strengthening their cause, by throwing numbers of people out of employment.

It was on the night of the 30th of March that a general insurrection was intended to have commenced at Manchester. The magistrates were to be seized; the prisoners were to be liberated; the soldiers were either to be surprised in their barracks, or a certain number of factories were to be set on fire, for the purpose of drawing the soldiers out of their barracks, of which a party stationed near them for that object were then to take possession, with the view of seizing the magazine.

The signal for the commencement of these proceedings was to be the firing of a rocket or rockets; and hopes were held out that 2,000 or 3,000 men would be sufficient to accomplish the first object, and that the insurgents would be 50,000 strong in the morning.

At this period, and in other parts of these proceedings, there are traces of an intention to issue proclamations, declaring the King's subjects absolved from their allegiance, and denouncing death against all opposers; but the Committee have not found any evidence of the actual preparation of such proclamations.

This atrocious conspiracy was detected by the vigilance of the magistrates, and defeated by the apprehension and confinement of some of the ringleaders a few days before the period fixed for its execution. The timely prevention of this desperate attempt appears to have given a considerable check to the proceedings of the disaffected in that quarter; and all the subsequent intelligence which the Committee has seen from thence continues to be of a more favourable character.

During part of the month of April an intermission appears indeed to have taken place generally, at least of the more open proceedings, public meetings in large bodies could no longer be convened, except under the regulations of the recent Act of Parliament. Numerous meetings of societies have been less frequently held in public-houses. In some districts clubs have been dissolved; in others their meetings have been suspended, or have been held in private houses, or in places remote from observation. The necessity of greater caution has been felt and inculcated; communications by writing have been discontinued; the concealment of the names of leading persons has been recommended; and it has been thought better that a few persons only should be intrusted with their plans, and should give notice to the different delegates to have their partizans in readiness to act when required and as directed. These delegates appointed from various places have met in small numbers, and thus kept up a general but verbal correspondence among the disaffected.

Towards the end of April, and during the month of May, this correspondence appears to have been carried on with increased activity. As early as the 5th of that month a meeting is stated to have been held in one of the principal towns of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and to have been attended by persons calling themselves delegates from other principal towns of that district; and also from Leicester, from Birmingham, and from Nottingham. At this meeting reports were made by the different delegates of the strength which could be collected from the districts which they represented. The numbers were stated as very large; but the Committee are well aware of the exaggeration to be expected in such cases. It was about this time that the period for another general rising appears to have been fixed for as early a day as possible after the discussion of an expected motion for Reform in Parliament. Nottingham appears to have been intended as the head-quarters, upon which a part of the insurgents were to march in the first instance. They were expected to be joined there, and on their march towards London by other bodies with such arms as they might have already provided, or might procure by force from private houses, or from the different depôts or barracks of which the attack was proposed.

At various subsequent meetings at different places, reports are stated to have been made of a great increase of numbers, so great that it was said on one occasion that they were obliged daily to extend their divisions, and enlarge their Committee.

Concurrent information from many of the quarters from whence these delegates were said to be deputed, confirms the expectation of a general rising about the time above-mentioned, and states its subsequent postponement to the 9th or 10th of June, for which various reasons were assigned.

The latest intelligence from those quarters had made it highly probable that the same causes which have hitherto thwarted the execution of these desperate designs, viz. the vigilance of Government—the great activity and intelligence of the magistrates—the ready assistance afforded under their orders by the regular troops and yeomanry—the prompt and efficient arrangements of the officers intrusted with that service—the knowledge which has from time to time been obtained of the plans of the disaffected, and the consequent arrest and confinement of the leading agitators, would occasion a still further postponement of their atrocious plans. Subsequent intelligence leaves no doubt that the plan, in its full extent, has for the present been frustrated: but the correctness of the information which had previously been obtained has been confirmed by the recent appearance of bodies of men in arms at the precise period which is stated to have been fixed upon, and particularly in one of the districts, which had latterly been represented as determined to act without waiting for a general insurrection.

The Committee think it highly important to state, that the reports received from many of the most active magistrates, and from persons whose stations, both civil and military, have enabled them to collect the most extensive information, and to form the most accurate judgment as to the state of the country, concur in attributing in a very considerable degree the disappointment of the attempts already made, and the hopes of continued tranquillity, to the actual exercise of the powers which Parliament has intrusted to the Executive Government, and to the effect of the known existence of such powers ready to be called into action when necessity requires it,—and in representing the danger which would threaten the country, were those powers to be withdrawn at the present moment. And the Committee feel that they should ill discharge the trust reposed in them, if they did not declare their own entire agreement in this opinion. With the fullest confidence in the general loyalty and good disposition, not only of those portions of the kingdom which have hitherto remained in a great degree untainted, but of by far the most considerable part of those very districts which are the chief scenes of the operations of the disaffected—a confidence which very recent experience has satisfactorily confirmed—they cannot refrain from submitting to your lordships, as the result of all the information they have received, that the time is not yet arrived when the maintenance of the public tranquillity, and the protection of the lives and properties of his Majesty's subjects, can be allowed to rest upon the ordinary powers of the law."

The Earl of Harrowby moved, that the Report do lie on the table, and be printed, which was ordered.

The Earl of Liverpool then gave notice, that in case the Report should be printed in time, a noble friend of his would bring in a Bill for continuing the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act to-morrow, and move the first reading on that day.

Lord Holland presented a petition of freeholders of Berkshire against the farther suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. This petition, his lordship stated, was agreed to at a very large and respectable meeting, and would have been much more numerously signed had it not been apprehended that Ministers intended to hurry through both Houses the bill for continuing the suspension, and that the petition might come too late.—It was read, and laid on the table.

COMMISSION OF THE PEACE, (IRELAND.) Earl Grey presented a petition of Patrick O'Hanlon, Esq. which stated, that the petitioner having freehold estates in the counties of Down and Armagh, had been appointed a justice of peace. That in 1808 his name had been struck out by Lord Chancellor Manners; that he had requested an investigation of his conduct; that Lord Chancellor Manners had afterwards written him a letter, stating that an investigation had taken place; that nothing had appeared against him; and that his name was restored in the list of commissioners of the peace. That in 1816 his name was again struck out. The petitioner stated, that in the discharge of his own duty as a magistrate, his principle was to deal with perfect impartiality between Protestant and Catholic, and that he had discouraged the Orange Societies, as well as those formed among the Catholics in opposition to them; that in discouraging the Orange Societies he had sometimes been under the necessity of acting contrary to the opinions and conduct of many of his brother magistrates; that he applied to Lord Manners for an explanation, but that all he could obtain was, a statement that a complaint had been made against him by some other magistrates, and the Lord Chancellor promised to call upon them for a specific charge; that the petitioner had conversed with the Attorney-General (Saurin) on the subject, and was informed, that the charge against him was, his discouraging the Orange Societies: that the petitioner had no occasion to call upon their lordships to vindicate his character, as that had been sufficiently cleared; but that he had petitioned the House for the purpose of directing their attention to these circumstances.

The petition was laid on the table.

Thursday, June 12.

COTTAGE WINDOW TAX (SCOTLAND.) A variety of petitions had been presented on this subject in the course of the session by Lord A. Hamilton, who repeatedly exposed the hardship and injustice of the tax. The noble lord now, with the acquiescence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, obtained leave to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the 43d Geo. III. c. 161, as relates to the tax on houses in Scotland, not having more than four windows, paying a rent not exceeding 5l. annually.

VACCINATION.] The Annual Report of the National Vaccine Establishment was presented, (by command) and ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

TRINITY HOUSE.] Mr. Birch, disclaiming any invidious reflections on the elder Brethren of the Trinity House, endeavoured to shew that the pensions were very partially distributed, and moved for a return "of the mode of election adopted by the elder Brethren on admitting petitioners to the benefit of the funds of the corporation applicable to charitable purposes."

Mr. Rose seconded the motion (a laugh), and accounted distinctly for any apparent partiality in the distribution of the pensions.

Mr. Curwen thought, that the pensions should be apportioned according to the contributions; and complained, that in Cumberland no appointment was made but through the influence of a noble peer. He complained also of the terms of a letter written by the elder Brethren of the Trinity House, in answer to some inquiries that had been made.

Sir F. Burdett remarked, that the comity of the right hon. gentleman's manner (Mr. Rose's), contrasted with the asperity of the letter alluded to, put him in mind of Dryden's character of Lord Dorset, "that he was the best natured man with the worst natured Muse;" he hoped the House would see that the funds were impartially distributed.

Mr. Money defended the conduct of the elder Brethren of the Trinity House. They had acted on all occasions in the most disinterested and meritorious manner; particularly in removing the buoys, under the peril of being hanged, at the mutiny of the Nore. If the Board acted wrong, a petition against them lay to the Privy Council.

Mr. Grenfell believed that the funds of the society had been distributed with great impartiality, though he agreed that the distribution should be proportioned at various places to the contribution.

Mr. Birch, shortly replied, and

Mr. Rose having explained, the motion was agreed to.

SHERIFFS IN IRELAND BILL.—FORFEITED RECOGNIZANCES (IRELAND) BILL.] These bills were read a third time and passed.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.] Mr. Tierney moved, that the Call of the House should be postponed till Thursday next.

Mr. Curwen said, the call of the House was a farce, after 70 leaves of absence had been given; either the call ought to be rigidly enforced or relinquished.

Mr. Bennet thought it of great importance that as full an attendance as possible should be obtained.—It was at last fixed for Tuesday next.

BRITISH MUSEUM.] In a Committee of Supply, the charge for the British Museum, (see pages 1351—1362.) was farther considered, and agreed to.

GRANT TO THE LATE SPEAKER.] Mr. Lushington moved the second reading of the bill for securing this grant.

Sir M. W. Ridley observed, that Lord Colchester's annuity was only to be diminished one half in the event of his accepting an office, equal, or greater in value than the annuity. He thought this an unnecessary deviation from the usual practice.

Mr. Ponsonby said, that Lord Colchester's pension was for his own life 4,000*l.* a year. Suppose him made Secretary of State, for which he would receive 6,000*l.* a year, was he to give up 3,000*l.* a year of that, or only 2,000*l.* a year from the annuity? There was a singular exception in this case to the general rule. He ought to give up what was equal to the salary of the office he accepted.

Mr. Lushington said, half the pension was to abate on the acceptance of office.

Mr. Ponsonby could see no reason for departing from the usual rule. If Lord Colchester took an office with a superior salary, he ought to receive the whole of such salary, and give up all the pension pro tempore.

The bill was read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

Friday, June 13.

Further evidence was given on Miller's Divorce Bill.—Proceedings postponed till Tuesday.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Lord Sidmouth rose and addressed the House as follows:—"The Report of the Secret Committee being now on your lordships' table, I present to your lordships a bill for the continuance of the measure called the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and in presenting this bill I beg leave to assure your lordships, that I do it under the fullest and deepest conviction of the urgent necessity that it should pass into a law. The ground on which that opinion rests, I shall state to your lordships on Monday next, when I propose, with your lordships' permission, to move the second reading of the bill.

His lordship then laid the bill on the table.

Earl Grey.—Following the example of the noble Secretary who has presented this bill, I shall reserve till Monday next the statement of the reasons why I am of a directly contrary opinion; but, my lords, I cannot suffer this occasion to pass without declaring, that from all I have heard, and all I have seen, I entertain the strongest conviction that there is no necessity for this measure: and that if any danger threatens the country at this moment—and I do not mean to deny that danger does exist—that danger arises from this measure, and the course of proceedings pursued by the Ministers of the Crown; which, instead of being a remedy for the evils of our present situation, are in reality a high aggravation of all the dangers to which the country is exposed.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

Lord Sidmouth gave notice, that he would move the second reading on Monday next.—It was ordered that the lords be summoned for that day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, June 13.

Mr. Peel took the oaths and his seat for the University of Oxford.—The right hon. gentleman was afterwards added to the Finance Committee.

ALE-HOUSES.] The Ale-house Licence Regulation Bill was read a second time, and committed, the report brought up, the bill ordered to be printed, and the report considered on Friday next.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS.] On the motion of Mr. V. Fitzgerald, the Irish Grand Jury Presentments Bill was read a second time. It contained a provision for the appointment of county surveyors to assist the Grand Jury in their deliberations.

Colonel Barry and Sir H. Parnell expressed their approbation of the general principle of the bill.

Mr. Peel thought the grand jurors should be relieved from the obligation of an oath of secrecy, so far as related to the civil business of the county; conceiving that public opinion was a greater check on misconduct than any legislative enactments.

Mr. Courtenay approved of the outline of the bill, but proposed to offer some modifications in the Committee.

Sir J. Newport urged the immediate forwarding of the measure.

Sir F. Flood entirely concurred in it, as far as it went.

Mr. Croker recommended, that if there were to be but one presentment in a year, it should be made at one assizes, and reconsidered at the next.

The bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday.

IRISH INSURRECTION ACT.] Mr. Peel moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on the bill to continue this act.

Sir H. Parnell wished for a Committee to examine into the matter, and particularly to consider the papers that had been presented to the House, respecting the disturbed state of Ireland. Inquiry should be made to ascertain the danger, and whether this bill was a proper remedy. It created six new transportable offences. It was said, they might depend on the magistracy and the Government; but it was not wise to grant such powers on personal grounds. By the continuance of different acts, a sort of gins d'armerie was kept up, and a new system of Government seemed intended for Ireland, by military means. The law was enacted to suppress attempts at rebellion, and continued in consequence of a French party being supposed to exist in Ireland, who administered oaths tending to the subversion of Government; but in the present instance, after all the explanations that had been given, no treasonable associations could be shewn. Indeed, this was clear, by Ministers not extending the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act to Ireland. That the ordinary course of law was sufficient, he thought evident from the trials and convictions in Tipperary in 1811, when six were sentenced to death, and twenty-seven to transportation. The procuring of evidence, therefore, could not be very difficult. In the county of Waterford, twelve were tried and sentenced capitally. In 1813, a barrack was burned in Tipperary, and thirteen persons were convicted. In two years and a half, 298 persons were tried and convicted by the ordinary process of the law, for felonious offences. The proposed measure was too violent, and therefore ought not to be applied to all Ireland. For the sake of gaining some time for examination, he moved that the bill should be committed on that day se'nnight.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, that Government had been driven to the measure by the necessity of the case. He could see no good ground for even one day's delay. The act had been passed by several successive Parliaments, and no gentleman could be supposed ignorant of its contents.

Sir S. Romilly said, he knew very little about Ireland, but he felt the duty he had to discharge in legislating in that House. He observed, that many benches were empty on a subject of so much importance as that of vesting the Government and magistracy of Ireland, with the power of taking away the Constitution from the people of that country, during a period of profound peace. Measures of this description were introduced, both into England and Ireland, relating both to our own subjects and to aliens, and might go on till the people became accustomed to despotic authority. At present the act was in force till the end of the session. All that had been proposed was, to defer it for a week, to give more opportunity of inquiring into the reasons of it; yet that was to be refused. As far as he understood the bill, it gave a power by which even an innocent man might be transported for seven years, because he was absent from home. It would be said, perhaps, that lawful cause of absence might be shewn. The man must prove that; but he might not be able to do so satisfactorily. The situation of the country might, unfortunately, be such as to require rigorous measures; but how could the House discharge its duty, without farther inquiry. From the best information he had received, he verily believed, that in Ireland the general relaxation of morals, and the mal-administration of the law, arose not from the state of the Catholic question, but chiefly from that animosity which generally existed among the people against each other. So he had been informed by persons of good judgment. The other day, the right hon. gentleman spoke of the manner in which the power had been hitherto exercised. It now appeared, that the outrages in Louth, were not the cause of its renewal. He (Sir S. R.) had understood that they were; he therefore required farther information.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald spoke to order, as the learned gentleman had no right to refer in that manner to arguments on a former debate.

Sir J. Newport thought the arguments used to recommend a measure, might be commented upon in all its stages.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald did not deny the competency of a member to refer to the reasons generally given; but objected to the going into a reply to particular arguments.

Sir W. Burroughs considered that every member had a right to notice all the arguments that were used in support of any measure.

The Speaker said, he conceived the point of order to be correctly stated by the right hon. gentleman; but infinite difficulty would evidently arise, if some latitude were not allowed beyond the strict line. This must chiefly depend upon the good sense and feeling of members.

Mr. W. Smith understood, that words used in a former debate were not to be repeated; but the case appeared different as to arguments.

Sir S. Romilly was sorry any interruption had taken place. He had understood that the transactions in Louth formed the particular ground of the bill; he had thought that that county alone was the object of it; and if so, he did not know why the act might not be confined in its operation to that district, without affecting the whole people of Ireland. It seemed impossible to divert the question of the consideration of personal confidence. Five or six gentlemen had supported the bill before, on the ground of the conduct of the Irish Government; but now this Government, it appeared, was to be changed. There was to be a new lord lieutenant, and a new secretary, and who they were to be was not yet known. The power was therefore to be intrusted to new, and as yet unknown hands.—There could be no reason for this, short of absolute necessity. Was there an English member present who could, with a safe conscience, vote this great power, without some previous information or inquiry? He asked if there was any English member who would wish to deprive Ireland of the benefits of the Constitution, any more than England? It was a reproach to the House not to have inquired more early into the state of Ireland. No one could see the comparative number of persons committed and convicted in Ireland and this country, without acknowledging that misgovernment must exist in the former, that the magistrates did not well execute their duties, and that it was necessary to correct that system of mal-administration by which Ireland was treated as a conquered country, and not as a member of the empire. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Peel observed, that the hon. and learned gentleman had mistaken what he said on a former occasion. He had merely said—that if the authority conferred on the Government of Ireland had been abused, it would have been a strong reason for refusing a continuance of it; but he never asked the grant of large discretionary powers on the sole ground, that when formerly given, they had been exercised with prudence, lenity, and moderation. He particularly disclaimed at the time any such plea, and rested the measure entirely on the necessity of the case. The hon. and learned gentleman was likewise mistaken when he said, that he referred to the state of the county of Louth alone as the only justification of the measure he recommended. His argument was, that though the country was generally tranquil, yet if there was one part of it so disturbed that the laws could not be executed in their usual course, it was necessary to arm the Government with this act, to be exercised on its responsibility, when the emergency arose. The motion of the hon. baronet, (Sir H. Parnell) appeared to be very extraordinary. He did not oppose the passing of the bill, but he proposed that it should be suspended till farther inquiry was made, and with this object he moved for a Committee. He (Mr. P.) denied that there was any reason for the appointment of such a Committee. He could conceive cases in which a special inquiry by a Committee should take place before Parliament proceeded to legislate, such as when evidence was to be examined, and facts collected; but here there was no necessity for farther information, if the statements laid before the House were at all to be credited. He had himself produced facts notorious to every Irish member, and known to the whole country. He had thus laid sufficient grounds for the measure he introduced. He had no motive for withholding information, and accordingly had given all that he knew. He called for powers that he thought necessary, and he produced evidence of that necessity. There never came before Parliament a case in which Government had more clearly offered the grounds on which it called for permission to act on its responsibility, and on which the House had received better means of judging whether that permission ought to be granted. The hon. and learned gentleman had claimed the privilege of judging on the question, and he was much obliged to him for the interest he took in it; but he was sure that he would allow the honesty of opinions of the members who had better means of judging than himself. He (Mr. P.) could not but refer here to the discussion which took place on a former night, in which many members stated their opinions on this measure, and pleaded, though reluctantly, its justification. An hon. baronet (Sir J. Newport) allowed its necessity, though he recommended previous and more extensive examination. The declarations of other hon. gentlemen were to the same effect, with the same qualification.—Against this general concurrence of opinion, there were only three members from Ireland that opposed it—the member for Queen's county, (Sir H. Parnell)—the member for Tipperary, (General Mathew)—and the member for Colchester (Sir W. Burroughs). The two last could not be supposed to be so well acquainted with the country, as, from professional avocations in the case of the hon. and learned gentleman (Sir W. B.), and from other causes of absence in the gallant general, they had not resided in Ireland much of late. The hon. baronet had accused him of wishing to introduce a new kind of government into Ireland, but he appeared very unhappy in his selection of proofs. The present, which was called one of the new measures, was really a very old act, and would not have been produced as an instance of a change of system, if the hon. baronet had reflected upon its history. This act commenced in 1806, and had been modified in 1808 and in 1814.—Adverting to the insufficiency of the measure, as mentioned by the hon. baronet, he denied that it was inefficient; and produced facts to substantiate his statement. In one county, in the course of 3 months, 10 innocent persons were devoted to assassination; 13 houses were plundered. In the 3 months after this act was passed, only one transportation took place, although there were eight convictions. In the county of Westmeath, an atrocious murder was committed on a witness merely for giving evidence. The magistrates applied for the Insurrection Act, which was granted in November, 1815, and withdrawn in April, 1816; the county was tranquillized, and only four transportations took place. In the King's County, where the same act was applied for on the same necessity, only one person was transported in the course of four months. He did not say that one transportation was the only evil resulting from it: he knew that many individuals suffered much inconvenience; but this was more than overbalanced by the protection which it gave to the peaceable and well-disposed. In the liberties of Limerick, the act was enforced in October, 1815, and withdrawn in April, 1816, and only one person was transported. He defended the conduct of the magistrates in applying for it, and contended, that the promptitude with which they called for its being withdrawn, shewed that they were convinced of its necessity.

Sir W. Burroughs entered into an examination of the various clauses of the act; commented in strong terms on its severity; and insisted, that while it was inefficient for the purpose for which it was intended, it produced the greatest inconvenience and oppression wherever it was enforced. He particularly dwelt on the immense disproportion between the numbers apprehended, and the numbers convicted, in the several counties; and argued, that as it was to be presumed that the Petty Sessions, so much praised by the right hon. gentleman, had done their duty, therefore all those acquitted had been justly acquitted, and had consequently been falsely and wrongfully arrested. In support of this argument he stated, that in Tipperary, 178 persons were apprehended, and 132 of these were acquitted; in another county 67 were apprehended, and 12 only convicted; in another, 11 were apprehended, and 1 only was convicted; in Westmeath, 63 were apprehended, 7 only convicted. In all, 328 were apprehended, 68 only convicted, and 268 acquitted; and therefore these 268 were to be presumed innocent persons, who had suffered on account of this act. This oppressive enactment was to be extended all over Ireland, for no other reason than because it had been before so extended. And by whom? he was sorry to say by those who called the most horrible scourgings and atrocious violence by the name of vigour. If such a system was to be continued in Ireland, he should despair of seeing that country ever return to the enjoyment of the blessings of the British Constitution, a Constitution so dear to every man who professed to know it. He should, indeed, despair if laws, which no one dared propose for the government of England, should be passed, and almost as a matter of course, to press down the people of his native country. Ireland was in a most deplorable condition, filled as it was on one hand with a depressed, and degraded population, and on the other, with an oligarchy, who were more ready to demand severe laws against the people, than the Government itself was to grant them. He should propose that the magistrates should no longer have the power of trying without a jury; and he entreated the House to consider that mere coercion, mere vigour, as it was called, would only add to the dissatisfaction which it professed to remove.

Mr. Peel and Sir W. Burroughs mutually explained.

General Mathew expressed his astonishment that so tyrannical a measure should be introduced, after the repeated refusals of the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh), to extend the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act to Ireland.—He contended, that by the present bill, the Irishman would be subjected to greater oppression than the Englishman; for the latter had counsel allotted to him, while the former was liable to be carried off without a moment's warning, by a set of fellows well known in Ireland (he meant no disrespect to the right hon. gentleman), by the name of Pealers; and then to be hurried before a set of intolerant bigotted Orange magistrates; thence to be thrust into prison, where he would be half starved, and would linger till the Government should please to transport him to Botany Bay; and all this for no other offence, probably, than for walking an hundred yards from his own house, perhaps in his own garden, and for stopping an hour or two longer than usual, to sup with a neighbouring friend. As to some of the counties alleged to be disturbed, he could say of his own knowledge, that Tipperary was perfectly quiet, and one of the members for Limerick had told him the other day, that the same was the case there, though to be sure no rents could be collected.—As to Louth, he believed that three or four of its districts were disturbed; but was [that a reason for giving the Government a powerful engine to control and tyrannize over the whole kingdom? Suppose a member for Yorkshire or Cornwall should tell the House, that three or four of the hundreds or districts in one of those counties were disturbed, for instance, by some squabbles and fighting among the miners, would a rignmarole story of this kind justify, in the eyes of the House, an enactment against the whole people of England? He did not know what were the ultimate objects of Ministers with respect to Ireland; but this he knew, that starvation, misery, and deep despair, were taking fast hold of that wretched people; that all public spirit was lost; that its commerce was destroyed; its fields laid waste and barren; its towns and villages were depopulated and desolate. Did the Ministers wish to add still farther to the miseries of that afflicted and degraded country? Was it their object to make it merely an impoverished province of England? (Hear, hear.) What did they mean by their cry of Protestant ascendancy? Was it their intention again to try their strength at the point of the bayonet, and force the people into insurrection for the sake of crushing them? He knew well that the late Lord Clare, when speaking of the seizure of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, had said,—“D—n the fellow, why did he not escape; we have long known what he was about, but we expected that he would get away.” This was one instance of the excellence of that notorious system of informing then so rife in Ireland, and which seemed to be spreading in a country not so distant? Did the House know, he could assure them it was a fact, that one of the most notorious informers in Ireland, was now in England, and had been one of the grand jury which the other day found a bill against the prisoners now on trial? (Cries of hear, hear.) Yes, this man, formerly an united Irishman, and who betrayed his associates, was now Thomas Reynolds, Esq., of Welbeck-street, a freeholder of the county of Middlesex. (Hear, hear.) He was now a flourishing man; and equally flourishing perhaps, hereafter, might be another informer—he meant that horrible wretch, that infamous villain, Castle! (Cries of hear from the Opposition, and of order from the Ministerial benches.)

Mr. Goulburn trusted that the House would feel that the gallant general was not in order.

General Mathew proceeded. He wished to repeat his question, What was meant by the cry of Protestant ascendancy? Did they mean to serve Ireland as it was served by the Deputy Mountjoy, in the time of Elizabeth, and by the savage Cromwell, who parcelled it out among his British soldiery, and hungry followers?—Was the country again to be confiscated and parcelled out? If so, the Ministers might indeed enjoy the barren triumph of reigning in gloomy silence and sullen dignity, over an universal waste, or an universal barrack, till all that remained of what once was Ireland, the scanty and wretched relics of ancient honour and ancient valour, should sink at last into a condition of such abject debasement, as, like negro slaves, to lick the very feet of the odious tyrants who trod them down. (Cries of hear.)

Mr. Blake, Mr. Croker, Mr. Knox, and Sir F. Flood, severally spoke in favour of the bill.

Sir J. Newport said, that the permanent tranquillity of Ireland could be secured only by an equality of political rights. The want of this he considered the basis of all the evils that prevailed. However, he believed that under the present circumstances of the country, the application of this law was necessary, and with that view he reluctantly voted for it, hoping that the business would be reconsidered early next Session.

The original question, “that the Speaker should then leave the chair,” was then put.

Sir W. Burroughs expressed his intention of proposing a clause, making it imperative on the magistrates to call a jury in all cases.

Mr. Peel thought the amendment would be inconvenient, and hoped the hon. gentleman would not attempt thus to modify the bill.

Sir W. Burroughs explained, and Mr. Peel replied, that the clause proposed would entirely frustrate the operation of the bill.

The original question was then carried, and the House went into a Committee on the bill.

On the clause that the bill should endure for one year,

Sir W. Burroughs moved as an amendment, “Till six weeks after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament.”

Sir J. Newport supported the amendment.

Mr. Peel said, the measure had been enacted on former occasions for seven years, and never less than two.

The amendment was negatived, and the House resumed, and the Report was ordered to be brought up to-morrow.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] On the motion of Mr. Arbuthnot, the House went into a Committee of Supply, when the following sums were voted: 10,000*l.* for works carrying on at the College of Edinburgh for 1817;—11,400*l.* to defray the expense of the Penitentiary House, from the 24th June 1817 to the 24th June 1818;—40,000*l.* towards defraying the expense of the building of a Penitentiary House at Millbank, for 1817;—and 40*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.* to make good the deficiency of the grant in the present

To a question from Mr. Gordon, Mr. Arbuthnot said, that 120,000*l.* had been already expended on the Penitentiary. The whole sum granted was 550,000*l.*

To a question from Sir S. Romilly, Mr. Arbuthnot replied, that the prison when completed would contain 400 males and 400 females.

The Report was ordered to be brought up on Monday.

GRANT TO THE LATE SPEAKER.] The House went into a Committee on the bill for securing this grant.

Sir M. W. Ridley proposed that the whole pension should abate, if the noble lord should be appointed to an office, the salary of which should be equal to, or greater than the pension.

Mr. Calcraft supported the proposal, and thought that the retired Speaker might fairly be put on the same footing as a retired Chancellor.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that as the bill now stood, half Lord Colchester's pension would abate in the event of his acceptance of any such office as that alluded to by the hon. baronet, to be restored on his retirement from that office.

After a few words from Mr. Gipps, and Mr. D. Gilbert, in opposition to the proposal, the bill passed through the Committee.

Saturday, June 14.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up the Fifth Report of the Committee on Public Income and Expenditure, respecting Irish Estimates of Civil Services.—It was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 16.

The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Poor Employment Bill, Bayley's and Owen's Divorce Bills, and several other public and private bills.

PERSONS CONFINED FOR TREASON.] Earl Grosvenor moved for a return of the persons confined under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, their names, numbers, descriptions and ages. He rather supposed that there would be no objection to agree to this in substance, and therefore made the motion without a previous notice. It was material that the ages and descriptions should be given, because he was persuaded that from these it would appear, that the persons in question had not been supported in whatever designs they might have entertained against the Constitution of their country, by people of any great consequence or consideration, or such as could afford to furnish them with pecuniary or any other assistance, to any great extent. Without giving any opinion, whether the prisoners now on trial at Westminster, were or were not guilty, he might take upon him to say, having attended during the whole of the trial as far as it had hitherto gone, that the prisoners had no connexions of any consequence.

Lord Rolle, adverting to the observation of Earl Grosvenor, that the disaffected were not supported by persons of any consequence, stated, that he was of a different opinion; for the speeches of certain noble lords in that House gave a spirit and encouragement to their designs. He had supported the Ministers in these measures, which, as he contended, were necessary and expedient; and would always support them as long as they continued to promote the best interests of the country. His support was perfectly independent, for he had nothing to ask and nothing to fear. He had the fullest confidence in them, and was willing to trust them with these powers for the safety of the nation.

Earl Grey said, the noble lord who spoke last had represented these measures as expedient and necessary, and the only measures which, under the present circumstances, would ensure the peace and tranquillity of the country. The proper time for the discussion of that question would have arrived when they came to examine and consider the portentous proposition which was this night to be submitted to their lordships. He would, therefore, at present content himself with declaring his opposite conviction. But there was another part of the noble lord's speech which he could not suffer to pass without observation. His noble friend had said, that the miserable individuals now standing in court for their deliverance, were not connected with persons of any consequence. He (Earl Grey) having also attended during the greater part of the trial, was of the same opinion; and could safely say, that nothing could be more extravagant than the plans of the prisoners, if plans they had; that nothing could be more contemptible or hopeless, than their means for carrying them into execution; and that the prisoners had not been connected with any persons capable of giving them any serious assistance.—But the noble lord (Rolle) had said, that the disaffected had been connected with persons of consequence in secret plots and conspiracies; and instead of naming those persons, as he ought to have done, he had, in a manner which was disorderly, and incompatible with, and destructive of, the freedom of debate, dared to assert that he (Earl Grey) and those in that House who concurred with him, had given countenance to traitorous plots and conspiracies—an accusation which he declared to be utterly unfounded. When he, in the discharge of his parliamentary duties, stated his objections to measures proposed by the Ministers of the Crown, from the fullest conviction that their adoption would be attended with danger and mischief to the country, was he to be told, and were others who had much more powerfully urged these objections, to be told, that they, in discharging their duties as members of that House, were encouraging and giving countenance to traitorous designs? He stated in the noble lord's face, and to his teeth, that the charge was totally unfounded; and he called upon the noble lord to specify particulars, and to prove his charge; otherwise he trusted the House would think it necessary to call upon the noble lord to retract what he had said, or to make some apology. The noble lord talked of his independence, and of the boldness with which he would oppose his Majesty's Ministers, if, in his opinion, they happened to be in the wrong. The boldness of the noble lord, however, happened to be of this character—that it had always been exerted in support of power. During all the multifarious concerns which had constituted the business of Parliament in the course of the last 30 years, never had the occasion arisen on which the noble lord found himself called upon to exercise this boldness and independence. There he left the noble lord, again asserting, that the charge against himself and his friends, of giving countenance and encouragement to traitorous plots and conspiracies, was disorderly, inconsistent with the freedom of debate, and utterly groundless.

Lord Rolle.—The noble earl has certainly misquoted and misunderstood what I said. I did not charge the noble earl and his friends with giving countenance to traitorous plots and conspiracies. I only said that the speeches of certain noble lords in this House had, not intentionally, but in their consequences, given spirit to the disaffected. I still remain of opinion that these measures are necessary and expedient; and I still say, that as long as Ministers go on to promote the best interests of the country, I will so long support them, and not a moment longer.

Earl Grey.—If the noble lord says, that I and those who concur with me, encourage traitorous plots and conspiracies, I can find no other terms in which to express my answer, than that I hold the imputation in utter contempt.

Lord Sidmouth objected, that the noble earl (Grosvenor) had given no notice of his motion.

Earl Grosvenor said, he had thought that no objection would have been made to it.

Nothing farther passed on the subject, and the motion fell to the ground.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS.] Lord Sidmouth moved the second reading of the bill for continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. He observed, that when the measure was first proposed, many persons thought there was no reasonable ground of hope that the necessity for it would cease before the end of the Session. Such, however, at that time was not the opinion of his Majesty's Ministers; for, notwithstanding the necessity under which they found themselves, of calling upon Parliament to adopt a measure of this nature, they indulged the hope that they should have the satisfaction of seeing its operation close with the Session. In that hope they had unfortunately been disappointed: but instead of following the precedents of former times, and proposing to Parliament to continue the suspension without a preliminary inquiry, they had thought it proper to recommend a new inquiry by a Committee of that House; and to lay before that Committee new facts and additional information which had reached Government in the interval between that and the former inquiry. They had desired their lordships not to adopt any further proceeding till their own Committee should have made its Report, and that Report was now before them. After mentioning that the Committee had examined the papers, it proceeded in the second sentence to state, "that it was their painful duty to report, that these papers afforded but too many proofs of the continued existence of a traitorous conspiracy for the overthrow of our established Government and Constitution, and for the subversion of the existing order of society." The Committee then proceeded to state the several grounds and circumstances on which this painful conviction rested. They stated that the first disturbances, since the period of their former Report, took place at Manchester; and then they set forth the designs and purposes of the disaffected, that "in public speeches, the necessity of doing away with, or disposing of, the persons most obnoxious to them, had often been openly and unreservedly announced; and that on one occasion it was stated to have been proposed, that Manchester should be made a Moscow, for the purpose of strengthening their cause, by throwing numbers of people out of employment; that a general insurrection was intended to have commenced at Manchester on the night of the 30th of March; that the magistrates were to be seized; the prisoners to be liberated; that the soldiers were either to be surprised in their barracks, or a certain number of factories were to be set on fire, for the purpose of drawing the soldiers out of the barracks, of which a party was to take possession, with a view of seizing the magazine." And the most sanguinary and barbarous outrages appeared to have been intended, but this design was defeated by the vigilance of the magistrates. The leaders being seized, they thought themselves justified in issuing proclamations, which proved that the objects of the conspirators were known to them, and this desperate and atrocious attempt was thus prevented. But even on that day movements actually took place, notwithstanding the disclosure of their designs, which afforded a decisive indication that desperate purposes had been harboured. Since the Committee had made this Report, further information had reached Government of an attempt of a more formidable and comprehensive nature in the northern and midland manufacturing districts. The Monday after an unexpected motion for a Reform in Parliament was to have been made, and which, it was anticipated, would be rejected, was fixed upon for a simultaneous and general rising in these districts. Of this, Government had proof from various quarters, and from the confession of some of the parties concerned. The execution of that plan was, for reasons not necessary to be detailed, postponed till the 9th of this month. The plan was so arranged, that the different districts should have early information of what was passing in each of them, and what took place on the 9th of this month left no doubt as to the atrocious purposes of the conspirators. That scheme, however, was also frustrated by the vigilance of the magistrates. But besides these overt acts of outrage, the secret meetings of the delegates of the disaffected shewed the atrocity and extent of their designs. The Committee stated, that "although in many of the districts particular causes of distress had, no doubt, operated to expose the minds of the community to irritation and perversion, yet they were persuaded that this distress must for the most part be considered rather as the instrument than as the cause of disaffection." And then they stated, that "they could not refrain from expressing their opinion, that it was chiefly by the means pointed out in the Report of the former Committee, by the widely extended circulation of seditious and blasphemous publications, and by the effect of inflammatory discourses, continually repeated, that this spirit had been principally exerted and diffused: that by these the attachment to our established Government and Constitution, and the respect for law, morality, and religion, had been gradually weakened among those whose situations most exposed them to this destructive influence; and that it was thus that their minds had been prepared for the adoption of designs and measures no less injurious to their own interests and happiness than to those of every other class of his Majesty's subjects." It was incontestibly true, that these causes led to the most dangerous consequences, and that certain persons made use of the distresses to which the labouring classes were exposed as an instrument to carry into execution their own nefarious purposes. Those who had been thus seduced and rendered the instruments of the machinations of others, ought no doubt to meet with comparative indulgence; not because they were excusable for suffering themselves to be involved in these practices, but because allowance ought to be made for the frailty of humanity. But what was to be said of those who thus made use of the distress of the labouring class, as an instrument to carry into effect their own atrocious purposes? He would not willingly go back to the dreadful circumstance that, on the first day of the meeting of Parliament, the sacred life of the Royal person who administered the Government in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty had been endangered. They petitioned for the meeting of Parliament, and this circumstance occurred on the first day of its assembling! What had been the conduct of Parliament since that period? They had petitioned for economy, and economy had been carried to the very utmost extent to which it could be carried consistently with the safety of the State. They had complained of sin-cures, whether right or wrong, and an arrangement was in progress respecting sin-cures. He did not mean to say that these measures were adopted with any view to please them; but they were the objects of their petitions. But at the very moment when they came with those hypocritical complaints and petitions, they were planning schemes to produce revolution, misery, and horrors in the country, such as it had hardly ever before experienced. Was that then a moment to abridge the powers given to the Executive Government by Parliament, for the purpose of preventing the effects of these mischievous machinations? The Committee stated, "as the result of all the information which they had received, that the time was not yet arrived when the maintenance of the public tranquillity and the protection of the lives and properties of his Majesty's subjects could be allowed to rest upon the ordinary powers of the law." And it must be presumed that their meaning was, that there was a necessity for the continuance of those extraordinary powers given by the act which passed at the beginning of the present Session. Without making any ostentatious professions of his attachment to the liberties of his country, he must say, in the face of the noble lords opposite, that he yielded of them in attachment to the freedom of the people and veneration for the Constitution. Many other circumstances, besides those mentioned in the Report, had come to the knowledge of the Executive Government; and they knew of many individuals who were engaged in promoting atrocious designs, although the proof was not sufficient, according to the policy of the law, to convict them. What was to be done with respect to these persons? Were they to be permitted to go on from day to day, and from place to place, perverting and poisoning the minds of the people, and leading them from disaffection to sedition, and from sedition to treason, without any power in the Government, for their own sake as well as that of others, to remove them from that society which they made it their business to taint and corrupt? In those places where the schemes of the conspirators had been most advanced, the Act had been put in execution; the leaders were in custody, and the consequence was, that in those places the atrocious designs of the conspirators were frustrated and defeated. Such had been the effect of the execution of the Act: but it was not in this way only that it had been useful: the Committee stated, "that the reports received from many of the most active magistrates, and from persons whose stations, both civil and military, had enabled them to collect the most extensive information, and to form the most accurate judgment as to the state of the country, concurred in attributing in a very considerable degree the disappointment of the attempts already made, and the hopes of continued tranquillity, to the actual exercise of the powers which Parliament had intrusted to the Executive Government, and to the effect of the known existence of such powers, ready to be called into action when necessity required it; and in representing the danger which would threaten the country if those powers were to be withdrawn at the present moment." It was with this impression that he proposed the continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and he called upon those who objected to it to say that there existed no danger, or to state what measures they would provide to meet the danger, if they admitted its existence. Some of their lordships recollected, and had a share in the measures that were adopted in 1794-5-6. At that time the same course was pursued, and in the same manner it was opposed. Efforts were then made to invalidate the reports of the Committees of both Houses of Parliament, and it was then, too, asserted, that they were founded on deception and mere absolute fictions or gross exaggerations. The two Houses, however, persevered in their proceedings, and, supported by the magistrates and the great mass of the community, they had preserved the Monarchy, the Constitution, and the Country. The Executive Government was then also falsely and slanderously charged with a desire to subvert the Constitution; but their lordships would do their duty now as they had done it before, and the same happy consequences would follow.

Lord Erskine said, he felt it quite impossible to give his support to this measure. The diseases of the human and the political body, and the remedies applied by the physician and the statesman, had often been the subject of comparison; but with both the proper selection of the remedies, and the success of their application, depended upon a strict examination of the cause of the disorder. Now the causes of the disorders referred to in the Report of their lordships' Committee had been examined into, and therefore it could not be expected that the remedy to which Ministers had resorted should be effectual. The causes of the disorders, in his opinion, might be shortly stated. They consisted chiefly in the distressed state of the country, exhausted by a long and expensive war; in the sudden check which had been given to the employment of capital; a reduction of the wages of labour, and a taxation almost insupportable: these were causes sufficient to account for that state of the country which was the subject of complaint, and which Ministers had made the pretext for measures so little calculated to cure it. He was perfectly ready to admit that there was a great spirit of irritation in the country. He agreed with the Report thus far: but what direction had that irritation taken? This was a circumstance which ought to be well considered before their lordships agreed to measures so totally incapable of allaying it.—The direction it had taken was towards an object which had been thought worthy of pursuit by some of the most illustrious men this country ever produced. The people very generally attributed the calamities of which they complained to their want of control over the representation of the country. Had they not a right to think so? Had not the greatest men in the country thought so? He did not deny that there had been excesses, nay, criminal excesses, in various parts of the country; but might not these be accounted for, though not excused, by the disregard which was paid to the feelings of the people? They had been denied what they considered their birthright, and instead of taking their petitions into consideration, the objects of their prayer had been rejected by great majorities. Whenever the people assembled in bodies, the great object to which their attention was directed, was almost always the state of the representation. Their lordships could not, therefore, mistake the cause of the irritation. Indeed, from the Report itself, it appeared, that the control which those who addressed them had over their minds was obtained by having it in their power to tell them that they were deprived of their birthright. How could it be imagined that this was to be cured by measures which evidently tended to aggravate the complaint? If the laws which protect personal liberty were allowed to remain unimpaired, the sound part of the country could, in answer to all the misrepresentations of sedition, refer to the benefits of the British Constitution: but what reply could be made when that Constitution was suspended? The noble Secretary had said, that men had been arrested on strong and well-founded suspicion, who could not be brought to trial from want of evidence; but this was no reason for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. If, when that act was in force, persons were committed on suspicion of seditious or treasonable practices against whom sufficient evidence could not be immediately prepared, upon affidavit being made that the witnesses for the Crown were not ready, they must stand committed. The truth was, that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act served only to heighten the odium of Government prosecutions. It had been considered, that in the trials of 1794, the prisoners had a great advantage in the suspension of that act and the severe proceedings of the Government. He doubted not that the same thing would be experienced in the present times, for there would always be a feeling on the part of the public in favour of men who appeared to be suffering under arbitrary power. It had been said, that the measures to which Ministers had resorted were calculated to save the Parliament, the Constitution, and the Monarchy. Such was the language of 1794, as well as of the present day; but then, as now, the verdict of a jury had saved the liberty of England, and he thanked God for it. The noble Secretary had dwelt on the event which occurred on the first day of the Session. On that occasion he was convinced there had been no intention to make any attack on the person of the Prince Regent. If any manifestation of unpopularity ever attended his Royal Highness, it could only arise from Ministers having endeavoured to connect him with these measures. That the people should be taught to connect in their minds the measures of Administration with the head of the Government was of all things to be avoided. But what alteration in the state of the country did the noble Secretary expect to produce by continuing the suspension of this Act? To return to the analogy with which he had set out, he would ask the noble Secretary what he would say to a physician who should address him thus:—"You are very ill, you are a great deal worse since you took the medicine I prescribed for you. You have not taken enough, and though the medicine has not yet done you any good, you must go on taking it." He did not know what the noble Secretary would say to such a doctor; but, for his part, he would tell him, that he must either change his medicine, or he would change his physician. The noble Secretary was, however, determined to act on a different principle with his medicine: he had tried the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and though he found it did no good, but, according to his own confession, made things worse, he was determined to continue it. But why not resort to other remedies since this panacea had failed? Might not an attempt be made to do away the corruptions which prevailed in elections? Such a proceeding would not be revolution, but reformation. He would suffer death in its worst shape rather than consent to any measure that would undermine the constitutional monarchy of the country; but it was not derogatory to the Constitution which they had inherited from their ancestors, to say that it was capable of reform and amelioration. At any rate, he would say, do something to remove that irritation of the public mind which is said to be the foundation of the present discontents. The Government possessed sufficient power without the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act for preserving the peace of the country. Ministers had both the civil and military power at their command; the yeomanry, the militia, and even the army, if need be; and it was their duty to employ all this force in suppressing insurrection or riot. On these grounds he objected to the second reading of the bill.

The Duke of Montrose agreed with the noble lord, that it was the duty of the Government to keep down riot and insurrection: but was it not better to prevent than suppress them? He recollected the riots in 1780, in which the metropolis was in the possession of the insurgents. The insurrection was then put down, but it was with great loss of lives. If the insurrection on the 2nd of December had been allowed to come to a height, it might still have been put down, but it was better to prevent the recurrence of such acts than to take the chance of suppressing them when they occurred. The bill before their lordships was not a bill for preserving the Government or the Sovereign on the throne, but for saving the people from the effects of that madness and enthusiasm which would lead them to perdition.

Earl Granvener said, that if their lordships should think proper to sanction this measure, it would be vain to expect that they could conciliate the affection of the people. With regard to the Report, he confessed that it was much more candid than the last; but he could see no reason why the evidence should not be laid on the table, as no danger could arise from its production. It was true, it had been derived in many instances from informers, but were they persons to be screened and concealed? Their lordships were sensible that no human beings could be so degraded as informers. If any persons could be said to resemble Satan, it was those men who seduced others into crimes for the sole purpose of afterwards betraying them. He could imagine no excuse for the Government making use of the services of such infamous agents. In despotic Governments it was to be expected that spies should abound, because such Governments could not bear inspection: but in England, in any country possessing a free Constitution, and that Constitution well administered, nothing more merited reprobation than having recourse to such disgraceful means. The noble duke had alluded to the riots in December. He should not enter into any dispute respecting the nature of those disturbances; but he must remark thus much, that to whatever extent they had been carried, they had been suppressed without the assistance of any such extraordinary measure as that which was now proposed. It was a reflection upon the understanding of their lordships, to ask them to pass a law affecting the character and liberty of the nation upon a report of a very partial disaffection. The noble viscount (Sidmouth) had said, that it was impossible to reduce the expenditure of the country any farther; he said, on the contrary, they could and ought to reduce it considerably more. The noble viscount had said, that it was impossible to reduce the military establishment farther; he maintained, on the contrary, that ours was an enormous military force, which was not required by any foreign danger, or by the very partial domestic disaffection. The 18,000 yeomanry cavalry, the best force that could be employed, were sufficient to prevent all danger; at least in addition to the guards and garrisons, always kept up, they were more than sufficient; but if not, nothing was easier than to increase their number, although with such a force to protect us there was no old woman in the country that could feel alarm. The noble viscount had spoken of the abolition of sinecures as a proof of the anxiety of Ministers to meet the wishes of the people; the last time that subject was brought before them by him (Earl G.), the noble lord had opposed it:

so that those who then opposed it, now said, that the abolition was a proof how anxious they were to meet the wishes of the country! The bill, however, was not yet read a second time; and as he was formerly ridiculed for proposing to abolish sinecures, and as the abolition was denounced as monstrous and atrocious, he should carefully look into the character of the measure as now proposed, before he gave it his assent. A compensation was to be given in lieu of sinecures, yet we were to be told that 100,000*l.* were saved by their abolition. Merit should unquestionably be rewarded, but sinecures had not been given as the reward of merit, and there had been no great or valuable services that had not been munificently and splendidly rewarded. A Reform of Parliament was the wish of the people, and a reasonable and just wish, more particularly as to the duration of Parliament. From the circumstances that occasioned it, it was manifest that the Septennial Act was never intended to remain. Yet on this subject had Ministers manifested a disposition to yield to the prayers of the people? It was, it must be, the wish of the Prince Regent that his Ministers should attend to their petitions; but it was the conviction of the country that Ministers, and they exclusively, had for their object to establish a despotism. Had not they at present strong, very strong laws? They had the Sedition Act, the Mutiny and Insurrection Acts, laws which were found sufficient in the most dangerous times to maintain the Constitution, and the peace and security of the country. Yet now those laws were insufficient for the repression of what their own Report stated to be a partial disaffection. If this bill should be read a second time, he should move a clause in the Committee, that the Suspension be not continued beyond the duration of this Parliament. He felt it his duty, his most sacred duty, to oppose the bill, as tending to affect the fate of the empire, to increase greatly what it intended to prevent, and to produce a reaction too dreadful to be calculated or foreseen. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Redesdale was of opinion, that the suspension would produce general confidence, and that its abandonment would create alarm. He believed the power given to Ministers by this measure was as necessary as any power which they held. The noble lords had at one time said the whole country was disaffected, at another time only a very small part of the country: the Report stated that disaffection did not extend even over all the manufacturing districts, and over no part of the agricultural districts. The noble lord (Grosvenor) had said, that only despotic and bad Governments ever made use of persons who implicated themselves in conspiracy to detect others; but he would ask, where, in the history of the world, was there one instance of detection but by such means? What would be said of the commander of an army who used no spies or scouts, and what would be the consequence of his simplicity and folly? The system of secrecy that had been practised, was a proof of dangerous designs. Papers and correspondence were now abandoned, individuals conversing with individuals in private houses planned these conspiracies; hence the necessity of spies. If there was no guilt, why all this secrecy? It was said that no man of property was connected with them. No: because their object was to take away property from those who had it. In 1780 the Government and the magistrates had been terrified by the cry of Wilkes and Liberty, which had previously been so vehemently rung, and which was most dangerous to liberty. At that time a man going along the Strand, met a mob crying Liberty, and was desired to join in the cry; he insisted that he should have liberty to cry or not as he pleased, upon which he was knocked down. It was to disappoint the designs of such leaders, who would give liberty to none but themselves, that this bill was proposed. The effect had already been felt in preventing the most mischievous designs in Manchester and other places, and in stopping those who were on their march to London. The noble lord had said that Parliamentary Reform was the object of those people; but this was to say that the authors of the reports had neither sense nor honesty. In 1714, (for he had inquired into the measure adopted on similar occasions,) Lord Townsend arrested sixty-four leaders of the disaffected, and in consequence the effect of the rebellion of 1715 was prevented, though it appeared it was insignificant compared to that of 1745. The liberty of the subject was not in danger, for the power thus given extended only to political offences, and no person would be arrested without plausible grounds of suspicion. The name deceived the people, as if the whole of the writ of Habeas Corpus were suspended. The people, however, did not feel so hostile to it as the two noble lords supposed.

‘Let all their ways be unconfin’d,
And clap your padlock on their mind,”

was well said when first used, but was not applicable in the present state of the country. If they yielded to the petitions of the people, if they granted Triennial Parliaments, they would subvert the Government. It was sagaciously and correctly said in 1793, “Leave monarchy and aristocracy alone; universal suffrages once obtained, all the rest will follow.” Triennial Parliament would be the reverse of benefits: they would take power from the Crown, and give it to the aristocracy. The object of the bill was to prevent the necessity of using force, to save cities from suffering the fate of Moscow, and to protect their lordships from being threatened while deliberating in that House, as in 1780.

Lord King said, he had always understood that one great cause of that attachment to the Constitution of their country, and that respect for the laws which so eminently distinguished the people of this realm, proceeded from a sense of the excellence of the one in securing their liberties, and from a confidence in the equal administration of justice which they enjoyed under the other; but if by bills like the present they were taught that their liberties might be suspended on the slightest pretences, and that they would in vain invoke the interference of the law; if they were taught to think that Government and the Legislature were their enemies, instead of being their protectors and friends, they would lose all affection and reverence for established authority, and the blunders of the present Administration, though in other respects productive of much mischief, would appear insignificant when compared with a policy so pernicious. (Hear, hear.) It was foolish to say that such a measure as that before the House was rendered necessary by the existence of plots to overthrow the State. There was no systematic conspiracy or plot; there were no leaders, no means, no arrangements. The plot, if it existed, comprehended all the distressed, all the destitute, all without employment, or the means of subsistence; and for the discontents of such persons a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was not a proper remedy. This plot, as it was called, was a plot of people without property against those who had property; and to plots of this nature relief and kind treatment was the most efficacious remedy. To create alarms on purpose to ground on them an abridgment of the rights of the people, was always the resource of a weak and unsteady Government. It was always done to procure assistance from the ignorant and timid, when it could not rely upon the support of the wise and thinking part of the community; to make those who absurdly dreaded changes rally round the Administration of the day. During the war, the power and prerogative of the Crown had been increased: on the return of peace, it was hoped that the due balance of popular rights would be restored; but we had been disappointed, and found that the distress which followed the immense expenditure that extended the influence of Government was made a pretence for still farther encroachments on liberty. Acts were passed to abridge our freedom, and to suspend the Constitution.

Earl Grey said, the great question to be now decided was, whether the persons who were intended to be affected by this bill were capable of producing mischief to the Constitution if it did not pass?—whether they had the means of being dangerous under a due administration of the laws?—whether, in order to control their designs, it was proper to resort to a measure never formerly adopted, except in cases of paramount necessity?—and whether it was requisite, in fine, to surrender the liberties of the people to the servants of the Crown on such a Report as had now been laid before the House? Believing that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was not now the proper remedy for the discontents that prevailed, he would call upon their lordships not to entertain such a measure, for which no sufficient grounds were laid when it formerly passed, and the justification of which had been lessened by every thing which he had since heard. What was the danger which it was intended to obviate? It was a danger arising from severe and intolerable distress, which had been excited to irritation, and led on to disturb the tranquillity of the country by wicked and designing men. (Hear.) Was this a species of danger similar to that which existed on former occasions, when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended? A noble and learned lord on the cross bench (Lord Redesdale) had argued, that the danger existing now was similar to that which existed in 1794. He had on a former occasion contended, that it was different, and he thought so still, though he did not believe that even at that period the present measure was necessary. The noble and learned lord had referred to more early periods, namely, 1715 and 1745; yet how dissimilar were the circumstances of those times. In 1715 there was a Pretender to the Crown, supported by the power of France, and countenanced and aided by a powerful faction within the kingdom. This Pretender landed in Scotland, headed a formidable rebellion against the Government, drew numerous partisans to support his pretensions, and collected under his banners persons of high rank, extensive influence, and powerful connections. Even in the two Houses of Parliament he had his friends; and the spirit of disaffection was widely spread among all ranks of the community. Yet, even at that period, when a dangerous conspiracy, favoured and supported by foreign influence and foreign forces, prevailed; when a family recently seated on the Throne found their pretensions disputed by a rival, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus was opposed, and the Act was only passed for six months. (Hear.) In 1745, a dangerous rebellion again raged—not headed by men without means, without influence, without money, without resources, without plan or force, like those who had lately disturbed the public tranquillity, but assisted by an expedition prepared in France under Count Saxe, encouraged by increasing numbers, flushed with partial success, and particularly by the victory of Preston-pans, and favoured and joined not only by noble families and distinguished individuals, but countenanced by those great and learned corporations, the Universities, to such a degree that the streets of Oxford had been said to be paved with jacobinism (hear, hear): but even then this Act was passed with reluctance. He allowed that he could easily conceive a case of danger so great as to justify this measure, and that was, when a foreign enemy conspired with domestic treason to overthrow the Government. He should then submit to a temporary suspension of the Constitution, to effect its final preservation. Yet even on such occasions, so dear was the Act, and so necessary as a safeguard to every valuable right, that the suspension of it was opposed by many members of both Houses, and among the rest by a man (Mr. George Grenville), for whose character most of the noble lords who heard him must entertain the highest respect. The noble Secretary, who introduced this measure, had said, that he (Earl G.) had on a former occasion acknowledged the existence of the dangers that threatened the country. He had indeed acknowledged that dangers existed, but he had denied that they were of a kind to be suppressed or extinguished by the present measure. Instead of acting as a remedy, he was convinced that it would aggravate their violence. They arose—as had been truly stated by a man, (Lord Erskine) who had rendered considerable services to his country, and had produced great public good—from a long and expensive war, which had stimulated every branch of industry to a strained and unnatural vigour, in which we had succeeded beyond expectation; but which, by the load of taxation with which it had burdened us, and which we were only able to support by the energy and extraordinary resources which the contest called into exercise, now left us oppressed and exhausted. This war, in its transition to peace, had produced still greater evils; it had disturbed all the elements of society, it had left our manufacturers without employment, and our agriculturalists without means or a market; and what was now the remedy proposed for the natural discontents that arose out of this state of things?—to suspend the Constitution. Because there were a few designing persons ready to take advantage of the distressed to urge them to acts of violence, the whole people of England were to be deprived of their liberties, and those discontents aggravated which a wise Government should endeavour to remove. While man was man, distress would always furnish the means of irritation. A noble duke had said, that prevention was better than punishment; and this was a maxim which, in its proper application, he was not disposed to controvert or deny, but which, when pushed to its full extent, would go the length of justifying a total deprivation of liberty. Because liberty might be abused, and lead to licentiousness, therefore, according to this kind of reasoning, it ought not to be enjoyed; and every excess of despotism might be justified, as a means of preventing the evils of insubordination, and as an exercise of humanity. The noble duke was, however, in a mistake, when he supposed that the Suspension Act was the only means of prevention. The ordinary laws were sufficient: and this Act, if properly enforced, gave in this respect no powers beyond what the ordinary laws conferred. Under it no man could justly be arrested for treason who could not be arrested without it—it gave the power of detention without trial, but not of apprehending without evidence of guilt. The noble lord on the woolsack, he was sure, would assent to this doctrine, and would not claim for Government the authority by this bill of confining innocent persons, or persons against whom no proof existed. He (Earl Grey) knew, however, that the practice was not so limited. He knew that innocent persons might be imprisoned; he knew that respectability was no defence; he knew that though they might afterwards bring an action for false imprisonment, they could obtain no redress for their sufferings, because he was assured that a bill of indemnity would be brought in to screen their oppressors; and that, after being confined for years, after being carried from one prison to another, after being debarred the sight of their friends, and even excluded from the visit of the magistrates (cries of hear, hear), they would come out of their cells without any prospect of reparation for their calamities, or any means of establishing the innocence of their conduct, deprived of the power of punishing their enemies, or of obtaining that justice which they had a right to invoke. He asked, were there no other means of prevention? Had not the magistrates the power of arresting and confining? and had any case occurred for which this was an insufficient remedy? He had thought that this measure was not necessary before, when a more threatening Report was drawn up, the allegations of which had been materially contradicted. It had been impeached in what it said about Glasgow and the manufacturing districts; it was impeached in what it said about the London Union Society, the secretary of which offered to disprove its statements at the bar of the House; and it had been impeached by the grand jury of Norwich. (Hear, hear.) The very person who gave information from Norwich, and calumniated that city, had published an atrocious hand-bill, that menaced the public peace, and had passed unpunished. The same Report was impeached by the proceedings of the circuit in Scotland. Glasgow was one of the places where treasonable practices were said to prevail to the greatest extent; and yet there, only 50 were taken up upon a charge of swearing unlawful oaths; and these oaths, there was no doubt, were administered by hired spies and informers. (Hear, hear.) Ten of these persons had been confined and liberated; only one was brought to trial, and against that one there were three indictments, a circumstance sufficiently indicative of the weakness of the Government. Another case in that city was that of a man (Neil Douglas), accused of uttering seditious expressions from the pulpit; this charge was supported on the testimony of six hired informers, who were contradicted in their evidence by such numerous and respectable witnesses, that the public prosecutors gave up the cause with shame. Here was another impeachment of the former Report on which our liberties were suspended (hear); and such contradictions proved how cautious the House ought to be in legislating on the information of such agents. He (Earl G.) had attended to the evidence on another trial (that of Watson); and supposing every word of it to be true, he could not say that the characters implicated were of a kind to excite alarm, or to call for any measure for their control, except the common administration of the laws. When he reflected that the whole people of England were to be impeached and condemned unheard, for the crimes or the absurdities of such men, he did not know whether contempt or indignation should most take possession of his mind. (Hear, hear, hear.) These men were without means, without influence, support, or plan; yet it was said, they meant to barricade Oxford-road, to block up the streets leading to the Bank, to seize the shipping in the river, and to attack the Tower without cannon, which, after all, was summoned to surrender by a single individual. (A laugh.) The plan, such as it had been described, was carried into execution; and the very manner of its execution shewed the weakness and contemptibility of the plan. Supposing all that had been stated to be true, he had heard the proceedings described by two respectable witnesses in the Court of King's Bench; one of them, Mr. Hall, (High Sheriff of Essex) stated that the whole transaction was so ridiculous, that twenty men might, at any time, have dispersed the whole mob. He himself went to the officer on duty in the Tower, and requested a file of no more than twenty men; he considered that number quite sufficient to protect the gunmakers' shops from injury. The officer on duty, having no orders to send out soldiers, very properly refused to do so: but he (Earl G.) must say, he wondered that Ministers, having intelligence that the Tower was to be thus attacked, had permitted such excesses to take place. Another respectable tradesman, (Mr. Brander, gunsmith, Minories,) had affirmed, that he thought six men would have been sufficient to quell the tumult; and that the mob seemed to have so little of a settled design, that they discharged their pieces in the air. When we saw such effects the result of such plans, could it be said that the danger now existing at all resembled that which existed in 1793? But we were now told, that although the same clubs and meetings did not exist as in the winter, the same designs were still cherished, and the same spirit prevailed; that a system of delegation was still persevered in, and that a general rising was in contemplation; and what foundation was there for these allegations? Here we had an answer from the Report of the Committee itself. The information was derived from parties engaged in the transactions, either on their own account, or with a view to the profit to be derived from information. Such testimony was always suspicious, and the Report of the Committee admitted that the language and designs of persons of the latter description had had some effect towards inflaming the general disorder. A noble friend of his (Earl Grosvenor) had reprobated the employment of spies, but he had been answered, that they were a necessary evil; and that it was quite Utopian to expect to unravel a conspiracy by any other means. He (Earl Grey) had thought that this practice had been condemned by orators and statesmen, by writers and great men of every age and nation; that it was a practice sanctioned only by the most despotic Governments; that it poisoned the sources of confidence between man and man; that it was destructive of domestic happiness and individual security, and altogether inconsistent with the existence of public freedom. Mr. Burke had said, (he had not the whole of the animated passage then with him) "that where spies were employed, men were obliged to fly from their very species*," and if these persons, sent to penetrate into the designs of others, were to instigate and impel them to the commission of crimes (hear, hear) he would ask, what must be the state of society to sanction such a proceeding; a proceeding hitherto considered at variance with every principle of social order and happiness? Would the Government, having employed spies, and found that they thus conducted themselves, any longer connive at such proceedings, or hesitate to bring such offenders to justice? (Hear, hear.) Would it be endured that these men, enriched with the blood-money of their fellow-subjects, these harpies, who contaminated and polluted more than they destroyed, should continue thus unmolested to infest and destroy? (Loud cries of hear.) He maintained that they ought forthwith to be consigned to the punishment their offences demanded. Was what he alleged with-

* The following is the passage in Mr. Burke's writings, to which the noble Earl referred.—"A mercenary informer knows no distinction. Under such a system the obnoxious people are slaves, not only to the Government, but they live at the mercy of every individual; they are at once the slaves of the whole community, and of every part of it; and the worst and most unmerciful men are those on whose goodness they most depend. In this situation, men not only shrink from the frowns of a stern magistrate; but are obliged to fly from their very species. The seeds of destruction are sown in civil intercourse, and in social habitudes. The blood of wholesome kindred is infected. Their tables and beds are surrounded with snares. All the means given by Providence to make life safe and comfortable, are perverted into instruments of terror and torment. This species of universal subservency, that makes the very servant who waits behind your chair the arbiter of your life and fortune, has such a tendency to degrade and debase mankind, and to deprive them of that assured and liberal state of mind, which alone can make us what we ought to be, that I vow to God, I would sooner bring myself to put a man to immediate death for opinions I disliked, and so to get rid of the man and his opinions at once, than to fret him with a feverish being, tainted with the jail-distemper of a contagious servitude, to keep him above ground, an animated mass of putrefaction, corrupted himself, and corrupting all about him."

the foundation? Had not Castle, a man of the most infamous and detestable character, been relied on as a witness on this late trial? a man who had lured one, and transported another accomplice in forgery; who had been imprisoned two years for assisting in the escape of a French prisoner, and punished for having tempted another to break his parole; who (though it had not been exactly proved) lay strongly under the imputations of bigamy and perjury; and who had lived in and been bully to a house of infamous dissipation. It had very soon been suggested, that the things which he charged others to be guilty of might have been perpetrated by himself: and so, in truth, they were. It was he who put the ammunition, as it had been called, into the waggon. The ammunition, indeed, was of such a nature and quantity, it could have been placed there with no other view but that of supplying some ground for an information; and there was the strongest presumption for believing that it had been placed there by him alone, and without the knowledge of any of his acquaintance; for when the party proceeded to the town, they left their ammunition behind them. (Hear, hear.) Besides, on all occasions he was the most forward. It was he himself that uttered the most seditious language, and gave the most inflammatory toasts. From this example it was not an unreasonable inference to suspect, that the information on which the whole body of the people was to be put out of the pale of its liberties was not of a very different description. He himself (Earl G.) had seen the evidence of the correspondence between the delegates, and it appeared, that there was one man who carried on the communication from Sheffield to Glasgow, and thence to other places. Would the noble lord say, that the plans of the conspirators were not encouraged by the very person he was now describing, and that he was not in correspondence with Government? (Hear, hear.) And then, with these instigations to impel them, who could read of the blunt despair of those wretched persons who were described as having laid down their arms, and having retired to rest their exhausted frames by the road side, deprived of the power of attack or resistance, without being deeply affected, without thinking that they were led on to their destruction by these participators of their guilt? He should now communicate to the House a statement he had received from Sheffield. If the person principally named in it, one Oliver, was not in the pay of Government, he would give up the whole. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) He wished that his name might be recorded as the foulest of traitors, and the most atrocious of criminals: a person setting at defiance the laws of God and man, and converting the death and destruction of his fellow-creatures into his own emolument. (The noble earl here read from the Lords Mercury a statement respecting Oliver, in Yorkshire to commit acts of riot and sedition, and commented on that person's conduct in terms of the greatest severity; comparing it with Castle's when he came from the Tower, and meeting Mr. Hunt, informed him that the rioters had been in possession of it an hour. He urged that this Oliver had held out the strongest instigations to sedition; and, though he did not mean to impute to Ministers the guilt of this man's conduct, he dwelt on it to shew the nature of the evidence on which it was proposed to ground the sacrifice of all our liberties, and to insist that Ministers were bound to bring this man to punishment. He dwelt on it, to shew the danger of employing men of this description; to shew that it was incompatible with the security of mankind; and, above all, with the happiness of a free country. He asked, whether it did not shake to the foundation the Report of the Committee, and convey strong suspicions that the secret conspiracies to which these unhappy men seemed prone, from the want of employment, and the distress consequent on the cessation of a long war, was not produced, fostered, and supported by the agents of Government itself? On the statements now laid before them the House ought, at least to pause, before they gave full credit to the Report of the Committee, and at least inquire into the proceedings of this Oliver. But, even if the act were not as he contended, if these disturbances had not been instigated by the agents of Government, still the character of the persons concerned, persons of the lowest order only, without power, property, connexions; sufficiently negated the possibility of any danger. If the laws of the country were not sufficient against persons of this description, when should we hope that they could possess any efficacy? As to the evidence and correspondence from magistrates, he begged not to be considered as throwing out any imputations against that body, but he thought their recommendations should be attended to with suspicion; they all resided in the disturbed districts, they were all alarmed, and all prone to look for remedies in extraordinary exertions of power. All the documents tended to shew the necessity of discarding a practice that had never been tolerated in any period of society—the encouragement of and reliance on informers. In Ireland a proceeding of the same sort, in the case of Mr. Hamilton, 1806, had nearly terminated in the destruction of 14 Catholics; they were on the point of being convicted when the falsehood of the whole testimony was accidentally discovered; he, Attorney-General relinquished the prosecution on the spot, and placed the informer immediately on his trial for perjury. He had been led to recollect this business in Ireland, for the encouragement of informers had there produced that system of despotism to which we were but too rapidly approaching here. He was persuaded that all these disturbances might have been put down without the employment of any such means. But we all knew that crises of disaffection were always convenient to Government; and when the demand for retrenchment became too importunate, when it was almost necessary to abandon some of the fortresses of corruption, these measures were resorted to, in order to suppress the public voice. He wished to accuse no man; but it had been his misfortune to view many invasions of the Constitution; and sitting there as a member of Parliament, with that constitutional jealousy of the proceedings of Ministers which used to be thought a part of the duty of Parliament, he still saw encroachments which rendered him distrustful of the measure now proposed. He lamented to see in that House, as well as in the other, and in the whole community, a sort of apathy and disregard of the conduct of Ministers, and a disposition to fly to force as a cure for those evils for which the law had appropriated milder and more efficacious remedies. By those laws, in all ordinary cases, where the disaffected were not supported by persons of wealth or power, or assisted by correspondence from abroad, the means of Government were quite sufficient to subdue any ordinary tumult. For his own part, he had been utterly unable to discover the danger that was now insisted on. The Report of the Committee owned that there was not only a great body still sound and loyal, but that even in the disturbed districts the majority of the people were well affected. In the very scene of disorder, the farmer, the yeoman, and all above the very lowest class, had joined in support of the magistrates, and 20 hussars had been sufficient to quell every appearance of disturbance. With these facts, was the case made out which was to justify the suspension of the liberties of the country, and to place every man at the disposal of Ministers?—for what time the noble lord had not stated, but it was held out, to some time after the next meeting of Parliament. He trusted the bill would not pass; but that if it did, it would not pass without an amendment, limiting its duration to a shorter period. At all events, he as an individual should feel it his duty to oppose it; and to support those principles on which he and his colleagues had ever acted. He had no object to gratify, no passion to indulge; he felt himself declining in years and strength, and this might perhaps be the last duty he should perform for his country; but he conjured the House to consider maturely the evidence before them, and to advert carefully to the facts which had arisen out of a purpose for detecting disaffection, but which had been encouraged by the very means employed to farther that intention. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Liverpool admitted, that in considering the evil to be guarded against, a stronger remedy ought not to be applied than the case required. But what was that evil? The real question was, whether there did not exist, in the judgment of that House, an organized conspiracy for the purpose of overturning the Government? The noble earl had urged, that on former occasions of disturbance the Government had not attempted to apply the same remedy. It was true, that where those disturbances consisted of nothing more than an unlawful conspiracy for the destruction of frames and machinery, they did not apply the remedy now suggested, because they thought it inapplicable to such a purpose. The noble earl had seemed to consider, that the disturbances had entirely grown out of distresses, the existence of which we were all too well acquainted with: but it was clear, that these distresses, instead of being the real cause of the disturbances, had only afforded a handle to those who wanted to turn them to the furtherance of their own wicked purposes; for in districts where there was no distress, where manufactories and trade still flourished, there was more disaffection than in districts where the deepest distress was experienced; and in many other places where there was the greatest portion of suffering, there still prevailed the most loyal spirit. With respect to the nature of the conspiracy, it was not confined to one town, to one county, or to one district. It pervaded seven or eight counties: the disaffected were acting by associations, by correspondence, and by sending delegates from one meeting to another: the House knew the mischief which some of the disturbed districts had suffered. In March last, the town of Manchester contained bodies of armed men: muskets, pikes, and other weapons, were prepared in large quantities, and every thing was carried on under a regular system. But the noble earl's argument practically came to this—that if no persons of property or consequence were engaged in these transactions, there could be no necessity for this measure; and he had stated, that in all former periods the question for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act had rested on that ground. However, before he discussed that point, it would be necessary to say a few words as to the employment and conduct of spies. The noble earl had asserted that all orators, statesmen, and writers, had, in all ages, condemned this practice. Whatever might have been said or written, he (Lord L.) knew that, in practice, this weapon had been always employed. The employment of it appeared in all the free States of antiquity, and in all the State Trials of this country. In those trials the whole basis and foundation of the proceeding had always rested on the information of persons in the employment of the State; otherwise it would have been impossible ever to detect offences. That this was an evil he was ready to admit; but he considered it unavoidable, and he knew that it had existed in all times. We had on this subject the recognition of our own statute book. By the civil list act, a provision was made for secret services; and the Secretary of State was obliged to depose on oath, that he had employed this money in foreign correspondence, or in the detection of conspiracies at home. He was ready to admit, that considerable difficulty existed in the application of this principle: but it was almost impossible, without such means, to secure the information necessary for public tranquillity. The noble earl had referred to a paragraph in one of the journals, and had detailed circumstances which, if they were true, he as much deplored as any body could; but with respect to the evidence brought forward in the late trial for high treason, he declared that the person alluded to (Castle) was not known to Government till long after the proceedings had commenced; and he would ask whether Government could reasonably refuse the evidence of an accomplice, when it afforded a probability of detecting all the guilt that had existed? As to Oliver, (of whom the noble earl had spoken so much,) this was the first time that he had ever heard of his being implicated in the degree so justly reprobated: he could only say, that that individual had rendered the most essential services to Government during the last three or four months. To a certain extent he had certainly been employed by the Administration: but instead of being incited, he had been particularly discouraged from acting in any way analogous to that described by the noble earl. The statement which had been read was ex-parte testimony: it might be correct, it might be otherwise: but even if true, he [Lord Liverpool] was prepared to assert, that spies and informers had been at all times employed by all Governments, and ever must be. And this being granted, it would, and must sometimes happen, that such persons, from zeal in their business, would go farther than they ought (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) But the consideration of this point could not influence the present question, because the proposal for a general rising had been entertained before this person (at least he believed so, he could not say positively) had meddled with the counsels of the disaffected. He would now revert to the general question, which was, whether it was necessary, in order to constitute a dangerous insurrection, that there should be engaged in it men of character, property, and rank. If the affirmative of this question were true formerly, it was not so now, because, as a noble baron (Redesdale) had stated, there was now, by means of clubs and different societies, that system of organization among the multitude which gave to disorder the effect of order, to ignorance the effect of intelligence, and thus enabled a mere mob to do what it had never been capable of doing before. If true therefore, formerly, our own experience proved that circumstances had arisen that made it true no longer. But was it entirely true, even with respect to former times? Had there been no conspiracies, ancient or modern, which, though composed of the mere dregs of the people, had brought great States to the very brink of ruin? Had forgotten the servile war of ancient time? or, to come nearer home, in an early period of our own history, when the power of the Crown was much greater than at present, and when it had been increased and sanctioned by the glorious victories of Edward III., was it not true that the country was then brought to the very brink of perdition by an insurgent mob, headed by a blacksmith, and were not many of the principal persons in Church and State horribly murdered before the tumults could be suppressed? Surely this proved that it was not necessary that men of high rank and property should be joined in a plot in order to make it dangerous. Had we not seen in modern times, he would not speak of the French Revolution generally, but had we not seen that in the dreadful disturbances of the memorable September and October, the mere mob did all the mischief, unled by men either of property or rank? True it was, that a populace once entirely roused would soon find leaders—he could say on his honour that he had no particular individuals in his eye; but men of property would soon join the rebellious rabble, not from approbation of their plans, but from fear of their vengeance. (Cries of hear.) Soon, however, it would be seen, that it would not be the chiefs that would govern the people, but the people that would govern their chiefs. (Loud cries of hear.) Instead, therefore, of thinking that a rabble, unheaded by men of consideration, would be less dangerous, he believed that it would be the more dangerous on that very account. The noble earl had asked whether we were so circumstanced that a multitude, unaided by rank or property, could overturn the Government? To this question he would merely say, that he should not like to try the experiment. But suppose this should not be done, was there nothing short of absolute subversion? Was it no evil to a commercial people that, in the language of the Report, “Manchester should be made a Moscow?” Was it no evil to a generous people that assassination should be inculcated as a regular duty? (Hear.) The noble earl had asked, whether, assuming the danger to be great, the present measure was the proper remedy; whether, in fact, the Government had not by law already the power of apprehending all persons suspected of treason? True, it was so; but without this measure there was no power of detaining those who were apprehended: and he would boldly assert, that one power would at this time be perfectly nugatory without the other. He firmly believed, that this power of detention without trial was the effectual and only cure for the existing evils. It operated not merely in the case of the persons detained, though he had amply seen its usefulness in that respect, but also on all persons who were conscious that they ought to be suspected. And if the state of Manchester was different from what it was before March last, he believed that to this measure alone the happy result was to be ascribed. It was, therefore, what it had been aptly called, a measure of mercy, a measure which every good man should had as the safeguard of his property and his freedom. If there was any one reason which weighed more than another with him, it was the love of the Constitution which he believed this measure would mainly tend to save. In the name of internal peace, in the name of morals, in the name of good order, and above all, in the name of security and liberty, he called upon their lordships to adopt it. The history of the world, more especially the recent history of France, proved that what was called liberty was so identified with anarchy, that its very friends, in self-defence, were compelled to throw themselves, for comparative safety, into the arms of the first despot that would rule over them. (Hear, hear.) The noble earl had expressed a fear, and it was a fear founded in reason, that the magistrates would, by the perpetual renewal of this bill, become used to a set of measures unlike the spirit of the British Constitution; but he would entreat their lordships by their love of the laws, by their love of tranquillity, by their love of liberty, to check, before it became too late, that dreadful spirit of disaffection and disorganization which he veily, and in his conscience, believed was far more destructive to the Constitution than such temporary suspensions of it as he now felt it his duty to propose. (Hear, hear.)

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, that in addition to what had been so justly observed, respecting the infamous character of informers, employed not merely to communicate but to create disturbance, he would illustrate the nature of such evidence by a particular circumstance which had come within his own knowledge. In the year 1812 he had himself the honour of being a member of a Secret Committee, which sat to inquire into the origin and effects of certain disturbances very similar to the present, and indeed the very root and foundation of them. A report was made to the House, which was in strict conformity to truth, as far as concerned the testimony given before the Committee; yet that report was in some particulars essentially false, because the evidence on which it was founded was untrue. A Mr. Horsfall had been murdered in one of the disturbed districts, and one of the principal witnesses who undertook to furnish the Committee with an exact account of the state of the popular spirit and feeling, positively asserted that Mr. Horsfall was murdered in the day-time, and in the presence of vast numbers of people, none of whom assisted him, but surrounded him and exulted in his fate. Now what was the truth? The murderers of Mr. Horsfall were taken, and soon afterwards were tried at York: and on their trial it was distinctly proved, that, when fatally wounded, he was not surrounded by an exulting populace, and for this plain reason, that there was no populace near the spot: there was no witness to the actual murder, nor did any one pass for some time: at length two passengers saw Mr.

Horsfall on the ground, and they immediately ran to him and afforded all the assistance in their power. (Cries of hear.) He mentioned this as a striking illustration of the necessary fallibility of an informer's testimony; and he had little doubt that the evidence on which the report rested would, if well sifted, be found to be of the same fallacious nature. (Hear, hear.) He now thought it necessary to ask their lordships, whether those countries had been the most free or tranquil where such powers as were now asked for had existed?—whether, on the contrary, such countries had not been the theatres of the most bloody, dangerous, and fatal revolutions? The noble earl opposite had referred to the French revolution; but surely that did not take place for want of such powers. (Cries of hear, hear.) Was it not rather the existence of such powers that instigated that revolution? The noble earl had been no less inappropriate in his reference to the disturbances of the fatal September and October. Those horrid scenes were not the mere work of a mob, but the first causes of them were to be traced to plots in which several persons of property, and rank, and talent in that nation were implicated. (Hear.) Let their lordships look to the allies of England, and see whether the most despotic government was the most secure. If utter indifference to the liberty of his subjects, if the perpetual exercise of a power like that now called for could make a monarch secure, then Ferdinand of Spain sat on the most stable throne in Europe. Was not, however, the direct contrary the case? But suppose it otherwise, would this country ever stoop to accept security on such abject conditions as were a disgrace even to Spain? He would now turn from the example of a despotic to that of a free government. The noble lords on the other side would probably admit that the executive government of America was too weak. He would remind them, therefore, that not many years ago, when a conspiracy (the noble marquis alluded to the case of Colonel Burr) of a formidable and extensive nature was discovered, and it was proposed in consequence to suspend the Habeas Corpus law, the proposition was almost unanimously rejected; and yet what evil consequences had resulted to the government of the United States? Was it likely that the mere detention of individuals at the pleasure of Ministers would suppress the danger which had been described? Was it not calculated to foment rather than to allay irritation? He was disposed to concur in the opinion, that a system of clubs and societies, such as at present existed amongst the labouring classes, was a pernicious system; but he could not agree that the evil would be most effectually prevented by the power of arbitrarily imprisoning the presidents and secretaries of such clubs, for new presidents and secretaries would soon present themselves.

Uno avulso non deficit alter
 Aureus et simpliciter frondescit honore.

They were all equally convinced of the necessity of punishing crimes; and the important question now was, whether the best mode of punishing and preventing them was not by the regular administration of law and justice, rather than by a system of arbitrary police? (Hear.) Whilst he recognized the existence of a certain extent of domestic danger, he felt himself bound to look also to its quality; and the result of this comparison and inquiry was, that the due exercise of the powers of the law tempering justice with mercy, aided by the influence of property, character, virtue, and talents amongst the higher orders, would form the best security against the danger. He should be sorry to consider even those who might have been engaged in some criminal transactions as irreclaimable; but when it was confessed that the great body of the people were sound, and when it was remembered with what fortitude they had supported their difficulties and privations, he felt himself justified in requiring for them the full enjoyment of that freedom which was their birthright, and of those constitutional advantages which could not be surrendered without some hazard of losing them altogether. The great body of the people were, he believed, inclined and able to put down any partial rebellion; and the surest means of preventing that calamity altogether was a general conviction of the excellence of a Constitution combining more personal liberty than ever had before been made consistent with the preservation of public peace. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Grenville declared, that in giving his best support to the measure now under consideration, he was induced to do so from a sincere belief that he was at the same time contributing his best support to the cause of freedom itself, as well as to the happiness and security of the country. When he assented to a similar proceeding three months ago, he had indeed but little expectation that in so short a period there would be such a change in the circumstances and dispositions upon which it was founded, as would render it unnecessary subsequently to prolong its duration. He concurred, however, in the necessity of passing it for a limited period, because he deemed it right that Parliament should reserve to itself the power of acting upon new information, in the event of new and important information being obtained. He must also declare, that he did not feel his character involved in the Report of the Committees of which he had been an humble member. It was not a pleasing duty to perform; but they had all, as he believed, as he was conscious he for his own part had done, proceeded with the best views upon the information before them. He was soon about to withdraw from the discharge of his accustomed public duties; he could have no inducement on this occasion to act upon any other principle than a sense of public duty; and although it would only be with life itself that he should entirely abandon pursuits, and desert a cause in which he had been engaged for five and thirty years; yet it was not improbable that this might be one of the last occasions on which he should have to claim the attention of their lordships. Whilst he concurred in much of what had been said as to the danger of the powers which the Executive Government required, and as to the misconduct of persons who instigated the crimes which they were employed to detect, he could not admit that intelligence derived from such quarters, and the credibility of which was supported by coincident circumstances, was not a fair and even necessary ground in some cases of legislative interference. (Hear.) Whether there had been misconduct or not on the part of Ministers, he could not doubt of the result of the examination, taking into view the whole of the circumstances. A conspiracy existed for objects detailed in the Report, and the progress of which their lordships were imperiously called upon to stop. The prevention of dangerous offences was certainly better than the punishment of them. In fact, it might appear to the eye of the moralist, that prevention formed the whole ground on which punishment was defensible. Arguments on all subjects might be pushed to the greatest extent. The question was, as to the proper application of them. In order to prevent crimes, a power should not be given, and exercised, which was in itself, and generally, injurious to society: but in the present case, if asked what were the grounds of his conviction in favour of the measure, he should say, that he thought this important and awful measure necessary for the prevention of great evils. That was his answer to his own mind, notwithstanding what might be said of the description of persons accused or suspected; and of their character, influence, and means, if employed in the attempt to overturn the Government. That these persons were at present important, he would by no means say; but yet there might be great danger in leaving them to work out their designs till the moment of complete exposure. He had too high an opinion of the good sense of the country to fear great dangers; but these dangerous practices would operate as an example and encouragement to all whose minds might be turned to disaffection. If a habit of provoking and insulting the Government were allowed to go on, it might be employed by the artful for the purpose of detaching the people from their regard for the Constitution. Perhaps the taking of the Tower was improbable; but yet enormous mischiefs might have occurred. The present times were different certainly from those of the Revolution, or of 1715 or 1745; but the peculiar nature of the dangers demanded a remedy. A medicine might be excellent for a fever, but might be of no use if delayed to an extremity. However painful it might be, he felt it his duty to support the measure.

Earl Spencer said, he felt great pain in differing from the noble baron, for whose opinions and character he had entertained for many years the highest respect; but on this occasion he could gather no solid grounds of argument in favour of the awful and dangerous experiment that was proposed. The subject had been so fully treated; that at so late an hour it would be presumption in him to enter into details. He had before said, that nothing short of absolute necessity could justify the measure; and that necessity had not been shewn. It was vain to talk of the responsibility of Ministers on a measure which gave them arbitrary power; they would come afterwards with a bill of indemnity. The matter rested entirely with the consciences of their lordships. He would venture to say, that the ground now laid for the bill would be stated again at its expiration, whenever that might happen, in favour of its renewal. Not one good argument had been adduced to shew that the country would speedily be in a better state.

The Duke of Sussex observed, that he did not wish to press any observations on the House; but the question struck him forcibly in a moral point of view. The effects of rigorous laws in despotic Governments were very observable. Thank God, as yet in this country, poisoning and assassination were but little known! He was strongly impressed with the idea that where the public feelings could not be openly and publicly expressed, they would be displayed in another and a more dangerous manner. If sufficient evidence could be shewn for this measure, he would readily submit to it; but if not, he must oppose it in every stage. He had read the Report of the Committee with deep regret. He ascribed no unfair motives to the framers of it; but it contained contradictions, and stated facts without proofs, on the evidence of improper witnesses. On all that had appeared, he could not consent to vote away the liberties of the subject.

Their lordships then divided—

Monday, June 16.

Sir L. Holmes presented a petition of inhabitants of the Isle of Wight against a renewal of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord R. Seymour presented a similar petition of the Portreeve, Freeholders and Inhabitants of Tavistock.—Ordered to lie on the table.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.] It was ordered that the following petition of protestant freeholders of the county of Cavan, (presented on the 2d May) should be printed:—"That the petitioners, the there-undersigned protestant freeholders of the county of Cavan, beg leave to express to the House their perfect concurrence in, and assent to, the petition presented during the last session to the House from a meeting of Catholic nobility and gentry, assembled on the 13th day of February at the house of Lord Trimblestone at Dublin; the petitioners beg to assure the House, that they join most heartily in the prayer of that petition, which they hope may again come under the consideration of the House in the ensuing session, and from the granting of which by the House they anticipate the most happy effects, by the restoration of peace and unanimity to this country, without the possibility of its affecting, in the most distant degree, the perfect security of the Protestant establishments of these countries, to which they take this opportunity of expressing to the House their warmest and most devoted attachment."

INSURRECTION ACT CONTINUANCE (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

LORD COLCHESTER'S ANNUITY BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

SMALL DEBTS BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

USURY LAWS REPEAL BILL.] This bill was considered in a Committee, and reported. The report to be taken into further consideration on Monday next, and the bill to be printed, as amended.

SPIES AND INFORMERS.] Sir F. Burdett rose to call the attention of the House to a subject of the greatest importance, both to the welfare of the Government and the liberties of the country. He had found it stated in a second edition of the Leeds Mercury of the 14th instant, which he had read this morning, that a person of the name of Oliver had been in the north, trying to excite people to illegal acts, for the purpose of entrapping them. It was stated that this Oliver was a spy of Government; and the Report which had been recently produced in another place acknowledged that such persons had been actually employed by Government. (Hear, hear.) The greatest exertions, it appeared, had been used by such characters to excite others to illegal acts, and for this they were paid and rewarded by Ministers. Nothing, he thought, could be more atrocious, especially in these times of wretchedness and distress, than for Government to hire and pay people to excite sedition. This was, indeed, an act so atrocious, so infamous, so diabolical, that he was almost ashamed to say he could give credit to the statement that Ministers had been guilty of such transactions. The fact, however, of such persons having been engaged, and afterwards rewarded by the Government, could not be denied. The character of Mr. Reynolds had been lately before the House: he was a most notorious spy, and had committed the most atrocious acts—acts at which human nature shuddered; but now he was under the auspices of Government, and had become a person of great splendour and affluence. (Hear, hear.) Aye, and had even been summoned (was it credible in such a country as this?) to act as a Juror, and had been one of the Grand Jury who found the bill against the four unfortunate men, whose trials were now pending in the adjacent hall, and against whom evidence of the same infamous cast had been adduced. (Loud cheering from the Opposition benches.)

Mr. G. Wynn here interrupted the hon. baronet.—He did not mean to insinuate that the speech of the hon. baronet was out of order, but he (Mr. W.) should be equally in order if he now moved that the standing order for the exclusion of strangers be enforced. (Loud cries of hear, from the Treasury benches, re-echoed by the Opposition.) The gallery was then cleared.

Mr. Brougham rose and moved an adjournment. He said, his reason for pursuing that course was, that he was determined to resist the attempt made by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Wynn), to imitate a practice which had been of late adopted elsewhere—(hear)—a practice most illegal—and tending immediately to sap the very foundations of criminal justice. (Hear, hear.) It was true, it was a proceeding that could be enforced by the law of contempt in the place to which he had alluded; but it was unjust, and too unfair to be imitated in that House. (The hon. and learned member alluded to an order made by the Court of King's Bench, that no part of the State Trials should be published, till the whole of the prisoners had been tried.)

Lord Castlereagh rose to order. He declared he must protest against the speech of the hon. gentleman, who was endeavouring to degrade and vilify the courts of law, (hear, from the Opposition benches) and to attack the privileges of Parliament.

Mr. Brougham continued: he said, whatever impropriety the noble lord might attach to the observations he had made, they could never be construed into a breach of the privileges of the House. It might be a contempt of the Court of King's Bench—that question he would not then discuss. That Court could make its complaint, and he should be ready to answer it at the proper time, and in the proper place. But he was not to be told that it was a breach of privilege. He had said nothing to affect the trial that was then proceeding, nothing to impute motives to the judges who presided: his observations were solely directed against the illegal and unconstitutional act of preventing accurate information being given to the public—a public, who had a right to be present, and who would have been present, had there been the possibility of providing adequate accommodation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wynn) having cleared the gallery, and caused the proceedings of that House to be carried on with closed doors, he should move that the House do immediately adjourn.

Lord Castlereagh repeated his former observations. The motion, he said, was contrary to the orders of the House, and the hon. gentleman's purpose was evidently that of vilifying the courts of law.

Sir F. Burdett contended that his hon. friend was perfectly in order, and acting in the most constitutional way, in resisting the attempt made by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. C. Wynn.)

The Speaker said, with reference to the point of order, that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brougham) had impugned the standing order of the House, relative to the exclusion of strangers, he was clearly out of order. If he had not, the reference he had made to the courts below was certainly not irregular.

Mr. C. Wynn felt desirous of stating his reason for excluding strangers. He was conscious that within 50 yards of them a trial for a capital offence was going on. The hon. baronet was remarking on the testimony that had been adduced; and he (Mr. W.) considered it as highly improper that any remarks should be made on a trial while it was yet pending. He protested against the motion of Adjournment, if it was made solely on account of the gallery having been cleared by him. It had been cleared in consequence of the extreme delicacy of the subject under discussion. (A laugh.) He asserted, that there must be an end to the independence of the House, if that right could not be exerted without being thus attacked.

Some further discussion took place, during which Sir F. Burdett observed, that his observations could not affect the trial, as the Jury had been locked up an hour before he rose to speak.

The House then divided—For the Adjournment 29—Against it 162—Majority 133.

The order of the day, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, was then read.—It was immediately moved, "that this House do now adjourn." The House divided—For the Adjournment 26—Against it 157—Majority 131.

A motion was then made, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."—It was again moved,

"that this House do now adjourn." The House divided—For the Adjournment 26—Against it 136—Majority 110.

The question, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," was again put, when an amendment was proposed to leave out all the words after the word "that," in order to add, "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee." No division, however, took place, and the main question having been again put and carried, the House resolved itself into the Committee, and strangers were re-admitted.

It was moved, that a sum of 300,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "to provide for such expenses of a civil nature as do not form a part of the ordinary charges of the Civil List."

Mr. Bennet immediately rose, and asked the noble lord (Castlereagh) whether Mr. Reynolds, of infamous memory, had been appointed consul-general to Malta? (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, he did not know why that question was put to him on those terms. He believed that several juries had given credit to Mr. Reynolds's testimony, and he did not understand why the honourable member should attach infamy to his character, unless it rendered a man infamous to be instrumental in the discovery of treasonable practices. Mr. Reynolds had been employed in his Majesty's service in Portugal, and also as postmaster-general; and had performed his duties with great credit and integrity; and therefore he (Lord C.) had no hesitation in recommending him as consul-general to Malta: he conceived he was justified in so doing, unless every man's character was to be blasted for assisting in the detection of such crimes.

Mr. Bennet said, that he did not impute any discredit to a man for coming forward and giving his evidence on such occasions; but he held, that a man who had been an accomplice in the crime, and who betrayed his associates, was an individual on whom no reliance could be afterwards placed. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh repeated, that he did not consider it any degradation to a man to give evidence in a court of justice in support of the laws. He had never heard any imputation against Mr. Reynolds's personal character, or the evidence which he had given; nor had he heard of any act discreditable to him, except his having been engaged in a rebellion (hear), for which he had made the best atonement in his power. (Hear, hear.)

Sir F. Burdett allowed, that every man was bound in duty to assist in the detection of treason; but he had always understood that Mr. Reynolds was a man of notoriously infamous character. (Hear, hear.) It had been proved on a trial, in which he gave evidence, that he had been guilty of the most atrocious crimes. (Hear, hear.) Captain Lymington and his brother asserted, that he had poisoned their mother;—

this stood recorded on the printed trial; and that he had broken open some private drawers, from which he took many hundred pounds.

(Hear.) Many other circumstances were sworn to, as appeared in the printed trial. It was sworn on that occasion, that he was not worthy of being credited on his oath (hear, hear, hear); but he had since become an important personage, and the protégé of his Majesty's Government. This was an infamy attaching to the noble lord and all his colleagues, which they could not get over without explanation. He should speedily take some means of bringing the subject under the consideration of the House, as it was necessary that this heavy charge against Government should be cleared up; but he could not, at present, state the precise nature of his motion.

Lord Castlereagh said, that such a motion would unquestionably be strictly parliamentary; but he must be allowed to doubt, whether tenderness to his Majesty's Government would influence the hon. baronet in making it. As to the assertion on the trial, that Mr. Reynolds ought not to be believed on his oath, successive juries had believed him on his oath, and Parliament also had believed him. He did not think Mr. Reynolds's character was tainted with any thing more than rebellion, (hear, hear, from the Opposition), though that was a great taint; but he had avowed his error (a loud laugh), had expressed his contrition, and had manifested his sincerity in a court of justice, by bringing traitors to deserved punishment. (Hear, hear.)

Sir F. Burdett said, his view of this matter had no reference to any particular Government; he would reprobate such conduct by whatever Government it might be countenanced. With respect to what the noble lord had said of the general character of spies and informers, he would only observe, that they might merit their reward; but to hold them up as objects of respect was most extraordinary; and in regard to the credit due to their testimony, no jury ought to believe it, unless it were strongly corroborated by other witnesses of unimpeachable integrity. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. C. W. Wynn desired that the question before the House might be read. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.)

Mr. Brogden (the Chairman of the Committee) then read the question relative to the Supply.

Mr. Bennet rose and said, that a debate had arisen on a question put to the noble lord opposite.

Sir F. Burdett apprehended, that the subject was quite open to discussion. He now asked the noble lord, did Reynolds receive a pension from the Government? (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh gave no reply.

Mr. Brougham then rose. He observed that, notwithstanding the enforcement of standing orders (hear, hear), every question of Supply was necessarily connected with the state of the griev-of the people. The Crown demanded money; the Commons had a right to demand redress of grievances (Hear, hear), and it was no light matter to have persons like Reynolds quartered upon them as pensioners. What would the country say, when they heard that the noble lord intended to send forth a person of this degraded cast as his Majesty's consul-general? (Hear, hear.) What would the continental ministers say, when they became acquainted with the character of this representative of the Government? In all commercial concerns, he was to represent the Government, at least so far as concerned the merchants of this country. Was it to be maintained seriously, that a person clothed in the character of a spy and an informer was to hold this situation? This, he believed, was the first time that any man had ventured in that House to pass a panegyric on spies and informers (hear, hear); persons of such infamy, that no one judge in England, or in Ireland either, would desire a jury to take cognizance of a case where their evidence was not fully and clearly corroborated. This Mr. Reynolds, it appeared, had for lucre come forward to swear (no matter whether truly or falsely) against his associates: he had turned informer, and this was sufficient to stamp him with all the infamy that attached to such characters, notwithstanding all the subtlety of the noble lord. He (Mr. B.) could not sufficiently express his abhorrence of such a character, nor his grief to hear the eulogium which the noble lord had thought proper to pronounce on it. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh appealed to the House whether he had pronounced any eulogium on Mr. Reynolds. He had said, that Reynolds had been engaged in the rebellion, but that he had afterwards avowed his error, and discharged his duties with great fidelity.

Mr. C. Wynn said, that if the hon. baronet had objected to the Supply, because the question of grievance had not been answered, he should not have interfered. He did not think, however, that the question of what credit a jury should give to a witness was a grievance. Certainly that House had always held, that grievances might be inquired into when the Crown came to demand a Supply. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Curwen thought it most disgraceful to Ministers to employ such a man as Mr. Reynolds in any public situation. He trusted that the noble lord would undo what had been done on this subject; because, though Mr. Reynolds might be rewarded for his services, it certainly was not fit to hold him up as a person to be employed in a public capacity. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution for the Supply was then agreed to, and the following sums were likewise voted: 1,400,000*l.*, "to defray the extraordinary expenses of the army for Great Britain for the present year."—100,000*l.*, "to defray the extraordinary expenses of the army for Ireland for the present year."—25,000*l.*, "for defraying the expense of making an inland navigation from the Eastern to the Western Sea, by Inverness and Fort William, for the year 1817."

The House resumed, and the resolutions were ordered to be reported to-morrow.

PRISONS (IRELAND).] A bill was brought in by Mr. Peel, and read a first time, "to amend an Act of the 50th year of his present Majesty's reign, for repealing the several laws relating to prisons in Ireland, and for re-enacting such of the provisions thereof as have been found useful, with Amendments."

TITHES LEASING BILL.] This bill went through a Committee, and the report was brought up, and ordered to be taken into farther consideration on Thursday next.

CLERK OF PARLIAMENTS, SIGNET, AND PRIVY SEAL OFFICES REGULATION BILL.] The order of the 5th of May for this bill (see page 827) was discharged, and another bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. D. Gilbert, Mr. Bankes, and others. Accordingly, a bill was now introduced, and read a first time, "to regulate the Offices of Clerks of the Signet and Privy Seal."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, June 17.

The evidence was finished on Miller's Divorce Bill.

EDINBURGH CANAL.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved the second reading of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Canal Bill.

The Earl of Morton objected to it, on the ground that the standing order, requiring a subscription for four-fifths of the work before a bill of this kind passed, had not been substantially complied with.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the order must be, and was substantially complied with.

The House must be satisfied of that, before the bill could pass: but this bill was one which would be attended with great public benefit, and there was nothing to prevent the second reading.

The Earl of Morton observed, that he objected to the principle of this bill, which was pervaded by a spirit of jacobinism; but he would reserve the statement of his objections till the third reading.

The Earl of Lauderdale replied, that the subject of this bill had been more fully discussed out of doors than that of almost any other bill of the same nature, and had received the general concurrence and support of the freeholders of the counties through which it was to pass. It would be curious to hear how the noble earl, at the third reading, would support his objections. A canal, if made by a certain party of some consideration at one time in Scotland, might be called a jacobite canal; but how it was to be made out that this would be a jacobin canal he could not conceive.

Lord Mcville corroborated the statement of the Earl of Lauderdale as to the consideration which had been given to the subject, and thought that his noble friend ought to postpone his objections till the bill should be committed.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

CHESTER PETITION—HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

Earl Grosvenor presented a petition of inhabitants of Chester, in Common-hall assembled, under a requisition to the mayor, against the continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The meeting, he said, was numerous and respectably attended, and the petition was adopted by a great majority.

It was read, and stated, among other things, that the traitorous conspiracies, which were said to be every where, were to be found no where, and were an ignis fatuus, which always escaped the pursuer.

The Bishop of Chester said, that the petition did not express the opinion of all the people of Chester. On the contrary, a counter-petition, very numerous and respectably signed, was soon to be presented to that House.

Lord Holland.—Did the right reverend prelate mean to say, that a petition from Chester was to be presented, begging of the House to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act?

The Bishop of Chester replied, that a counter-petition was to be presented.

Earl Grosvenor said, that those who were adverse to the petition had an opportunity of stating their objections to it, and opposing it at the Common-hall. They had opposed it, but it was adopted by a considerable majority.

The petition was laid on the table.

PERSONS CONFINED FOR TREASON.] Earl Grosvenor moved for an Address to the Prince Regent, praying there might be laid before the House an account of the names, ages, and descriptions of the persons arrested under the powers given by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, specifying those who had been discharged, and those who still remained in custody.

Persons confined for Treason. [1435]

Lord Sidmouth objected to give the number, as it might operate against the persons themselves. The number detained he was willing to produce, nor did he object to the ages being stated, particularly as there had been much misrepresentation on that point.

Earl Grosvenor stated, that he was anxious to have the description of the individuals.

Lord Sidmouth said, he could not agree to that part of that motion.

The Duke of Sussex observed, that he did not suppose his noble friend meant a description of their hair and eyebrows, but whether they were married or unmarried, &c.

Earl Grosvenor wished to have at least their situations in life, as it would shew that there were amongst them no persons of any consideration in the country, and therefore that no danger existed to call for the measures which were now proposed.

Lord Holland deeply regretted to hear that the noble viscount objected to disclose the names, as it thus appeared that Ministers not only had ordered, but that they intended to order the arrest of individuals, without any intention whatever of bringing them to trial.

Lord Sidmouth said, the noble lord might put what construction he pleased upon the conduct of Ministers; but he should feel it his duty to abstain from giving any further explanation. It must be evident that it would be highly improper to disclose the names.

The Earl of Donoughmore regretted that the noble viscount should have displayed any warmth, the charge not being against him, but against the measure of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. If it could be proved, that persons of rank, or of superior talents, were implicated in a conspiracy against the Government, he would most readily concur in giving every power that the security of the country might require; but when there were no persons concerned but individuals without rank or property, or without any name derived from their talents, what was to be apprehended; what was the danger that could call for the measures now proposed by Ministers?

Lord Sidmouth said, he could only agree to a part of the motion; and he therefore moved to leave out all the words after the word Address, and to insert merely an account of the number and ages of the persons detained.

Earl Grosvenor urged the propriety of agreeing to the original motion; but, under the circumstances, he was disposed to obtain what he could, and therefore he would withdraw his motion.

The motion being withdrawn, Lord Sidmouth's amendment was agreed to.

Lord Sidmouth then moved the order of the day, and the House resolved itself into a Committee on the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill.

On his lordship's motion the blank for the duration of the bill was filled up with "until the expiration of six weeks after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament."

Earl Grosvenor gave notice of his intention to move an amendment in a subsequent stage of the bill, to the effect, that it should expire in case of a dissolution of Parliament.

Lord Holland said he did not mean to discuss the bill now; he merely wished it to be understood that noble lords were not precluded from moving amendments in a subsequent stage. His noble friend had already given notice of one amendment, and another was intended to be proposed, to limit the duration of the bill to a still shorter period.

The Earl of Donoughmore intimated an intention of proposing an amendment, which would have the effect of producing the meeting of Parliament at an earlier period than it had been of late customary to commence the Session, by limiting the duration of the bill to a certain day, unless Parliament should assemble in the interval.

The bill then passed through the Committee, with the amendments proposed by Lord Sidmouth, and the House having resumed, the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 17.

The order for calling over the House, standing for this day, Mr. W. Dundas moved "that the said order be discharged."

The House divided—

Ayes, 126; Noes, 41.—Majority, 85.

CHESTER PETITIONS.—HABEAS CORPUS.] A petition of inhabitants of Chester was presented, against the farther Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; also, a counter-petition of the Mayor, &c. of Chester.—Ordered to lie on the table.

NEWFOUNDLAND TRADE.] A petition of merchants and inhabitants of Dartmouth, praying the House to protect the Newfoundland Fishery, was presented, and laid on the table.

Mr. M. A. Taylor then rose to call the attention of the House to the state of the Newfoundland Trade; the extent and magnitude of which ought to render it an object of deep Parliamentary solicitude. In this trade were employed no less than 300 vessels, navigated from this country, and manned by more than 6,000 men; who were thus educated for the naval service. It was a fact, highly deserving attention, that all the supplies of Newfoundland were derived from this country and Ireland. The returns made up Great Britain from this settlement were very great. The fish caught and cured in two years amounted, when sold in the European markets, to two millions sterling; all remitted in specie or bills of exchange; being the only description of trade by which a return similar in kind was made to the mother-country. He disclaimed all hostility to Government, or to the Board of Trade, in the motion which he was about to submit; but he pressed upon the House the indispensable necessity of taking some vigorous steps to relieve the place from its present distresses. By the last accounts it appeared, that of a population of 60,000 persons 5,000 were out of employ, and in a state of beggary. Famine and misery staring them in the face, they were prompted to acts of violence. They ransacked and plundered the warehouses, there was no security for the peaceful inhabitants by day or night, and provisions and other supplies were taken by force. If not promptly relieved, the settlement in the ensuing season would present a scene of horrible civil warfare. The merchants in this country, finding the trade of Newfoundland in so depressed a state, would not send out the ordinary supplies; and the place itself was incapable of any produce. Under these circumstances it was most important that some legislative measures should be adopted for the support of the trade; for it required capitals so large, that if once it were allowed entirely to sink, it would be a most difficult matter to revive it. One great cause of its depression was, the permission injudiciously given by treaty to the French to fish at Newfoundland. Another was the high duties imposed on the importation of the fish in Spain and Naples.—Strong representations ought to be made on this subject to the Kings of those countries, who having both been placed on their thrones by the arms of England, ought in gratitude to abstain from imposing on this Trade a duty so high as to amount nearly to a prohibition. The Pilchard Fishery, and the Whale Fishery, were protected by bounties, but the Newfoundland Fisheries were left without any protection. The French trade, on the other hand, was encouraged by bounties, which had nearly rendered the French our rivals in the markets of the Mediterranean. France gave a bounty not only on the fish caught, but on the ships and men employed; thus pursuing a wise policy, which he strongly recommended to the adoption of our Government. [The honourable member then read a list of the French bounties on their own Newfoundland trade, and a list of the Spanish Importation Duties on ours.] Reverting to the large part of the population of Newfoundland unemployed, and perishing for want of food, he observed, that Government had proposed to send 1000 of them to Brunswick and New Canada. More might be sent thither with advantage. Their absence would relieve the settlement, and they would assist in clearing and improving the colonies to which they might be conveyed. There were various modes in which the difficulties of the Newfoundland Trade might be mitigated, if not removed; but if no effort were made, that most valuable branch of our commerce must soon be at an end. Mr. Pitt, and afterwards Mr. Perceval, had shewn themselves fully sensible of the importance of the subject; and had agreed to the grant of some bounties, the expense of which was as nothing, compared with the benefit derived from their operation. He trusted, that when the Committee, for which he was about to move, had made their Report, the evidence attached to it would be generally read, as it would clearly prove the distressed state of the inhabitants, and the necessity of adopting some immediate measure for their relief.—He concluded with moving, “that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of trade to Newfoundland, and into the situation of that settlement, and to report the same as it shall appear to them to the House.”

Mr. Protheroe seconded the motion; complimented the hon. and learned gentleman for the clear and impressive manner in which he had represented the distressed state of the settlement, and urged the expediency of taking vigorous and prompt measures to relieve it.

Mr. H. Davis also supported the motion.

After a few words from Mr. Goulbourn and Mr. Wilberforce, the motion was agreed to, and Mr. M. A. Taylor, Mr. Protheroe, Mr. F. Robinson, Mr. Goulburn, and several others were appointed to form the Committee.

WATCHMAKERS.] A petition of Watchmakers of Coventry, respecting the distressed state of their trade, was presented and laid on the table.

Another petition of Watchmakers of Coventry, respecting their trade, was then presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It was as follows:—“The humble petition of the truly distressed Watchmakers of the City of Coventry, being counter to one already sent by a number of persons calling themselves such. The petitioners beg leave to approach the House with all the emotions of genuine respect, which should ever characterize the conduct of petitioners to such an assemblage of their country’s rulers; and though their feelings are depressed by poignant sorrow, still they encourage the exhilarating hope that their distresses will find an avenue to the wise discussions of the House, doubting not but they will exert their ablest efforts to relieve the present unprecedented distresses of the petitioners. The petitioners intreat permission to represent to the House, that the double licence on plate operates materially to their injury, by preventing numbers from retailing watches; but what is principally to be lamented is the introduction of foreign watches, which contraband traffic is still continued, to the great injury of their trade. The petitioners deem it necessary to state to the House, that a former petition of the distressed Watchmakers of the City of Coventry, reproaching the system of apprenticeship, was not the petition of persons confined to the trade, but a considerable proportion of other inhabitants of Coventry, not conversant with the business, nor in the least interested with it; and in several instances, names were introduced of Watchmakers who never sanctioned it, or even knew of such petition; that the petitioners beg leave to inform the House, that their present depression does not arise from the large establishments of apprentices (which they term the nurseries of vice and the poor-house); the manufactories of Coventry have been the prolific soil for genius to flourish in, and have produced mechanics which are an ornament and honour to our native country, men who in point of sterling merit will yield the palm to none; as a proof of which they beg to observe, that the London manufactories constantly send watches to Coventry to be manufactured; thus the petitioners contend, that it is neither the demerit of their work, or the system of apprenticeship, that causes the present calamity, but the causes above stated, in addition to the general distress that pervades a great part of the universe. The petitioners feel in duty bound, that whilst they are troubling the House to embrace this opportunity of rescuing a respectable class of individuals from calumny, as the present stagnation in their trade does not arise from any causes connected with the manufacturers, they beg to correct a misstatement in the former petition, respecting the number of hours the apprentices are at their labour, which does not amount to twelve hours per day, taking the year round, instead of fourteen hours as there stated, and also in respect to their weekly allowance, which is there stated at four shillings and four shillings and sixpence, when they are allowed to earn from five shillings to one pound each per week in addition, thereby tending to alleviate their parents’ burthen, adding to their own comforts, and imbibing habits of industry which are retained through life: the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the House will condescend to discriminate between the real and supposed evils, and to grant that relief which the House, in its wisdom is ever ready to afford.”

Mr. P. Moore and Mr. Butlerworth confirmed the statement respecting the distressed state of the trade, and hoped that some measures would be adopted for its relief.

OFFICES (SCOTLAND) REGULATION BILL.] The House having resolved into a Committee on this bill, a conversation ensued, in which Mr. Tierney contended, that the office of Muster-Master-General, 4,000*l.* a year, not being a reward for civil or military service, did not confer a vested interest; that it was similar to all other offices held during the King’s pleasure, and that there would be no injustice or hardship in abolishing it immediately, without waiting for the decease of the person who now enjoyed it.

Mr. D. Gilbert maintained, that it was such an existing interest as could not be abolished, without great injustice to the party who held it.

Mr. Tierney insisted that the possessor of the office would suffer no greater injustice on its abolition than a Minister on leaving office. The party himself never expected to hold the place for life, and to continue it was a downright tax on the country of 4,000*l.* a year, and a most indecent waste of the public property, after all the talk about economy.

The Report was ordered for Thursday next.

MINT OFFICES' REGULATION BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

LORD COLCHESTER'S ANNUITY BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] The Report of this bill was further considered; the bill recommended, and considered in a Committee. Some new clauses were proposed, when the Committee being told, and forty members not being present; and then the House being counted by Mr. Speaker, and forty members not being present, it immediately adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, June 18.

CHESTER PETITION—SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Lord Sidmouth, in the absence of the Bishop of Chester, presented a petition of certain inhabitants of Chester, expressing their confidence that the Executive Government would not ask for the extraordinary powers given them by the act for suspending the Habeas Corpus, unless such powers had been necessary for the preservation of public tranquillity; also expressing their disapprobation of petitions against the continuance of these powers, when the petitioners could not be aware of the evidence and circumstances; and then expressing their hope that the powers would be continued, in case it should appear that the state of the country required it.

On the motion of Lord Sidmouth, the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill was reported, ordered to be engrossed, and to be read a third time to-morrow, and the lords to be summoned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 18.

REPEAL OF THE SEPTENNIAL ACT.] Mr. Brougham postponed his motion relative to the repeal of the Septennial Act, till to-morrow evening.

MACHINERY.] A petition was presented of Mechanics, Artizans, and others, of London and Westminster, complaining of the excessive use of Machinery.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] The following petition of inhabitants of the Borough of King's Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, was presented, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.—“That the petitioners have learned, with deep regret, that it is the intention of his Majesty's Ministers to propose to the House the renewal of an Act for suspending the Act of Habeas Corpus; without presuming to offer an opinion, respecting any necessity for the recent suspension of the liberties of his Majesty's subjects, they beg permission to submit that the circumstances of the country do not require any further transfer of British liberty; at a time when universal tranquillity prevails, amidst general and unparalleled distress, such an Act as that which is in contemplation would, in the opinion of the petitioners, instead of consolidating and perpetuating an attachment to his Majesty's Person and Government, increase the evil of disaffection (supposing it to have had any existence), and be productive of mischief in every district of the Empire, and amongst all classes of his Majesty's subjects; these opinions, they beg further to state, are founded upon matter of fact, for, disgusted and dispirited, many valuable members of society, and loyal and truly patriotic subjects of these Realms, have emigrated from a Country whose Constitution could no longer secure their protection, others are unquestionably preparing to imitate their example, and those who remain do and must deplore the causes, which, while they are suffered to operate, leave the British Constitution with only a name, place the liberties of a free people at the disposal of a few individuals, and create a powerful temptation to attempt a transfer of wealth and talent and trade to other nations: the petitioners beg that the House will not construe this honest expression of their sentiments into the language of disrespect; as Britons they feel, as faithful and loyal subjects they fear, as acquainted with the source of relief, they apply to it for succour; as suppliants, they do most earnestly intercede with the House to pause before it listens to a proposal for any further suspension of the liberties of the people; and to reject, as unnecessary, as degrading, and as incalculably injurious, an Act, which, if it strengthen the executive arm, must paralyse the whole body.”

RIGHT OF VISITING PRISONS.] Lord Folkestone rose to make a motion, of which he had given notice some days ago, and expressed his regret that he should have to make it in so thin a House, and during the absence of those who ought to have been present, if they wished for an opportunity of justifying their measures. It had been the practice of Ministers to delay coming down to the House for an hour after business commenced, a practice that was often attended with great inconvenience; but as that time had now expired, and as they knew it was his intention to bring forward his motion on this day, he hoped he should stand acquitted of all unfairness, if he now pursued his original intention. (Hear, hear.) The motion which he was about to make was one of very serious moment, and he lamented exceedingly, that it had not attracted a greater attendance of members, how humble soever the abilities of the individual who felt it his duty to submit it to the consideration of the House. The object which he had in view was, to procure copies of all instructions sent by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to all officers, gaolers, and magistrates, respecting the custody and treatment of persons confined under the act for suspending the Habeas Corpus; and the circumstances which had called for this motion on his part were these. There were three persons under confinement in Reading-gaol, upon a charge of treasonable practices; they were called State prisoners: and, in consequence of some orders transmitted by the Secretary of State to the gaoler, the visiting magistrates of Berkshire were not allowed to visit them. Now he (Lord F.) as one of those magistrates, felt himself entitled to complain, that he was deprived of the right which he had, as a magistrate of that county, to visit that gaol; and he had no hesitation in saying, after the best consideration which he had been able to give the subject, that the authority which had been assumed by the Secretary of State on this occasion, was a gross violation of the law. With the leave of the House, he would read the clause in the Act of Parliament, under which he claimed the right of visitation. By the 31st of the King, ch. 46, it was expressly declared, "that, for better preventing all abuses in county gaols, the magistrates for the county, of their own accord, and without being appointed visitors, might, from time to time, enter into such gaols, and examine into the treatment of the prisoners: and if they saw any abuse, that they should report the same to the Quarter Sessions, and no abuse so reported, should be allowed any longer to continue." When the House found that this act remained on the statute book unrepealed, what would they say to the order of the Secretary of State, who had taken upon himself to prevent the magistrates from visiting the county gaols? The power thus arrogated was most illegal and unconstitutional: it was a direct violation of that clause in the Bill of Rights, which declared, that the laws of the land shall not be suspended or dispensed with, without the authority of Parliament; it was, in fact, a complete breach of the contract made between the King and the people, and, as such, it deserved the most grave and weighty consideration. He should have thought, that when he had stated this, he had said quite enough to put his Majesty's Ministers upon their justification; but he would examine some of the arguments which, he understood, were intended to be set up in their defence. It was said, that all gaols were the King's; that they were regulated by Royal prerogative, and that the power now exercised, had been always adopted with respect to State prisoners. Precedent might be quoted of the exercise of this power at the beginning of the last century; but the act to which he had alluded, was passed so lately as 1791, and, therefore, any precedent of previous practice could not apply, or be of any avail. In support of this argument, he must beg to observe, that, in the first place, every gaol in the kingdom was now made, a State prison, which was not formerly the case. State prisoners, as they were called, were then committed to the Tower, which was a military fortress, under the power of the Crown, into which no magistrate or justice of the peace had a right to enter; but, by the late act for suspending that great bulwark of our liberties, the Habeas Corpus Act, prisoners might be confined in any gaol, and removed from gaol to gaol, at the pleasure of the Crown. Now, to a certain extent, he admitted the rule, that the prerogative of the Crown could not be affected by an Act of Parliament, unless it were particularly specified in that act. He believed, however, that there were some very important exceptions to this rule, and supported by very great authority. In Atkins's Reports, in a case upon the statute of frauds, Lord Hardwicke doubted whether the King was not affected, though not expressly named. Sir Edw. Coke more than once expressed an opinion contrary to the general rule. The law for the abolition of the slave trade, most certainly extended to the prerogative of the Crown: but there was another very strong case—the case of perjuries prosecuted under the statute of the 5th of Elizabeth. Lord Chief Justice Holt there declared, that the King's pardon would not remove a man's disability to give evidence. In Baller's Nisi Prius, a work of great repute, it was also said, that the King's prerogative might be bound, though that prerogative was not named in the statute. Sir Edward Coke, in his Reports, said, that all statutes, to take away wrongs, or prevent frauds, shall bind the King, although he be not expressly named; and the reason which he assigned was, on account of the public good. The question, then, was, whether the act of the 31st of the King was an act passed for the public good, or not? Now, that act was made to prevent abuses in his Majesty's gaols, and nothing could be more for the public good than that object. The Crown, therefore, had no more right to violate this Act of Parliament than any other man; and, consequently, this order of the Secretary of State to prevent the magistrates from entering into the gaol, was a gross violation of that statute, and a suspension of the law of the land. (Hear, hear!) He was willing to admit, that all gaols were the King's; but he apprehended that the King had no peculiar prerogative over them. The building was the King's, but the custody of the prisoners belonged to the sheriff. This could be most satisfactorily established by positive acts of the Legislature. By the 14th Edward III., it was provided, that the gaols which were wont to be in the sheriff's custody, and of which they had been dispossessed, should be restored to their bailiwicks. An act passed in the reign of Richard II., was still more positive: it enacted, that the King's castles and gaols, once given to the care of the sheriff, but which had been severed from him, should be again put into his hands. By another statute, in the reign of Henry VII., it was expressly declared, that the sheriffs of every county shall have custody of the gaols. Nothing, he thought, could be more satisfactory than these several authorities. It might be proper however, to mention, that in former times the sheriff was not appointed by the Crown, as he now is, but was elected by the freeholders of the county; and when this was kept in mind, the importance of his office, and the propriety of investing him with the custody of gaols, would be more fully understood and felt. It had, indeed, been solemnly adjudged, that the sheriff has custody of prisoners, and that the King cannot abridge him of any thing incident to his office, notwithstanding the grant of the custody of prisoners by the King to other persons. Now what was it but the grant of the custody to other persons, when the magistrates, in consequence of an order of the Secretary of State, were refused admission to the prisons? Sir Edward Coke declared, that, in the 9th and 40th of Elizabeth, it was resolved by Popham and Anderson, and all the Judges of England, that the custody of gaols belongs to the sheriffs, and that the sheriffs shall have the custody of them, and that the custody of prisoners to other persons was absolutely void. He (Lord F.) contended, therefore, that this proceeding of the Secretary of State, to prevent the admission of magistrates who were entitled to visit gaols, was a gross breach of the law. What power, he would ask, had the Secretary of State, to enforce this order? Literally none. The gaoler was not appointed by the Secretary of State, he was not paid by the Secretary of State, nor could he be removed by the Secretary of State. He most sincerely hoped that the House would agree with him in thinking, that this subject demanded the most grave and serious consideration. The magistrates were directed, by the 51st of the King, to visit prisons, in order to see that no abuses existed: and now that we were commencing a system of espionage, (hear, hear, hear,)—when persons were taken up and confined on slight and unfounded charges, as the verdict of a jury had declared, (hear, hear, hear,) the provisions of an Act of Parliament, which was expressly made to prevent abuses, were most grossly and illegally violated by the sole will and pleasure of a Secretary of State. (Hear, hear, hear.) The King's Ministers had taken upon themselves to set this law of the land, made for the security of the subject, at complete defiance; they had trampled upon it, and declared that it was of no avail, as they had prevented magistrates from going to see whether abuses were committed in the prisons or not. (Hear, hear.) And why was this? Were Ministers afraid of the loyalty and integrity of the magistrates? (Hear.) Did they think that the magistrates of Berkshire were not fit to be trusted? If they really thought so (and what else did their conduct imply?) why were not those magistrates struck out of the commission of the peace? This, he repeated, was a most important subject: it was important to the prisoners, important to the magistrates, and to the whole body of the people. The order of the Secretary of State was highly improper and illegal; it was a complete and direct suspension of the law, contrary to the express declaration and provision contained in the Bill of Rights. He begged pardon for having detained the House so long, (hear, hear,) and would now conclude with moving, that there be laid before them "copies of all instructions, given by or sent from the office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to all gaolers, or other persons, to whose custody may be committed persons detained under the provisions of an Act passed in the present Session of Parliament, for enabling his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as he shall suspect are conspiring against his Person and Government;" and also, Copies of all Letters, or of Answers to Queries, sent to any Magistrates, respecting the custody and treatment of the same."

The Attorney-General commenced with saying, that the noble lord had stated a proposition which he was not at all inclined to deny, namely, that the King had no power to dispense with the laws. This was a principle settled at the Revolution, and expressly declared by the Bill of Rights. The noble lord, however, seemed to think that the regulations of which he complained had been now adopted by the Attorney-General for the first time. (Lord Folkestone said that this was no part of his argument.) He certainly understood that the noble lord's argument went that length. (Cries of no, no, from the Opposition.) The noble Secretary of State for the Home Department had not done any thing on this occasion which had not been uniformly and constantly done for the custody of State prisoners. The warrant for the apprehension of the parties, whether issued by the Secretary of State or any other person, specified that they should be kept in close custody; and the law ordained that they should be kept in such custody, not only previous to, but also during their trials. If the noble lord would take the trouble of examining the State Trials, he would find a vast variety of cases, both prior to and since the Revolution, in which this doctrine was maintained by judges who were as much friends to the liberty of the subject, according to the law of England, as the noble lord, or any other man. Instances of the exercise of the power now complained of had been sanctioned by Lord Holt, and also by Lord Chief Justice Pratt: by the latter particularly, in the case of Christopher Laver, Esq. who was tried in the King's Bench for high treason. (Nov. 21, 1722, 9 Geo. I.) Lord Chief Justice Pratt then made a rule that Mr. Laver's wife should be admitted into the prison, but all others were excluded, without an express order to the gaoler. It was true, that the sheriff had the custody of gaols; but the party who committed had always granted or refused permission to visit the prisoners. The sheriff of the county was to keep the gaol; he was liable for the escape of the prisoner, and, therefore, no other person had a right to be the keeper; but that did not in the slightest degree decide the question, that those who committed the prisoner were not empowered to order, that no person whatever should be allowed to visit him. The sheriff's gaol, and every gaol in the kingdom, was the King's gaol. It was laid down by Lord Coke, and by almost every other writer, that—"The gaol is the King's, though the subject may have the custody of that gaol;" and certainly, the King had always, through the medium of his Privy Council or Secretary of State, exercised the right of admitting or refusing persons to visit State prisoners. The noble lord had cited several cases to shew that particular acts bound the King, although he was not expressly named in them: but none of those cases had the slightest application to the subject. The noble lord thought, that in the case of perjury the King's prerogative of pardoning was taken away. That he denied. The Act of Parliament expressly stated, that no person convicted under that statute for perjury should be admitted to give evidence, unless the judgment was reversed; but it did not take away the King's power of pardon for perjury. With respect to the statute of the 31st of the King, he would venture to say, that when that act was passed, such a question as that which the noble lord had brought before the House was never in contemplation. It was made for a very different purpose. The object of it principally was to enable magistrates to visit penitentiary houses, in which the parties were to be under a sort of domestic government, for keeping them in a state of constant employment. It certainly spoke also of county gaols. (Hear, hear, hear, from the Opposition.) The act directed that two justices might visit and inquire into the state of the prison; and the intention of the act was not at all defeated by what was now contended for. In all ordinary cases, any magistrate might still go, might report abuses, or make his observations; but with respect to State crimes, in which the passions of men were always much engaged, it would be of the most dangerous consequence if every magistrate in the county might at all times converse with every prisoner, and that in private. Magistrates were but men; and every possibility of danger ought to be guarded against. The noble lord had assumed that the persons now confined had been taken up wantonly: this was a mere assertion; and he (the Attorney-General) had an equal right to say, that none had been taken up but those who deserved it. But the noble lord had contended, that whatever was the case before 1791, the law had been altered since that time. If so, it was a little singular that this was the first time an objection had been raised to the exercise of this power, because it was clear that, since 1791, in every suspension of the Habeas Corpus, similar orders were given at the discretion of the Secretary of State, as to every prisoner taken up under such suspension. But the noble lord's argument had nothing to do with the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus in particular; for if a party taken up at a time when there was no such suspension might be visited at all times, he might also when that act was suspended; and if he might be visited at all times, he might, even when his trial was going on; and it was impossible to enumerate the mischiefs that might ensue if communications with the prisoner were allowed at such a period. He maintained, however, that the right to control the access to a State prisoner was one of the prerogatives of the Crown, and had always been exercised by the Secretaries of State. It had been exercised before the Revolution, and since the Revolution, up to the 31st of the King, without opposition; and that statute, he contended, did not in any way affect or alter this prerogative: for though it gave the magistrates a right to visit prisons, it said nothing about any communication with the prisoners. The clause, indeed, respecting the visiting justices was more explicit; but even that said not one word on the subject of communication. He did not mean to state, that it might not be advisable or proper that on some occasions the magistrates should see and converse with the prisoners; but he did say that, with respect to State prisoners, his power was controlled by the King's prerogative. When the noble lord spoke of the difference between State prisons and the sheriff's gaol, he perfectly agreed with him; and it seemed to be admitted that the Tower at least was a State prison, into which the magistrates had not general power to enter: but he contended, that the placing State prisoners in any gaol made that gaol a State prison: and, therefore, the Secretary of State, in issuing regulations for the management of State prisons, had not dispensed with the law, but followed it. The noble lord's motion went to insist on the power of every magistrate to enter prisons at any time, and communicate with every prisoner. There was no foundation whatever for such an extensive power, and therefore he should oppose the motion.

Sir S. Romilly thought this question one of the most important that had come before the consideration of the House; and he had never heard a doctrine more dangerous, novel, or more destitute of all foundation, than that advanced by the learned gentleman. He deemed it unnecessary to inquire what was the power of the Crown, or what its prerogatives before 1791; the question now was, whether a Secretary of State could, without a violation of law, prevent the magistrates of a county investigating the state of prisons within their jurisdiction. Whatever his learned friend might throw out, it was impossible a question of greater importance could be discussed in that house than this—Whether the prerogative of the Crown could not be taken away by an Act of Parliament, without express words contained in the act for that purpose? His learned friend had said that it could not; and this was certainly true in some instances where civil rights were confirmed. The rule held good in the case of limitations, and in the case of the bankrupt laws, which did not affect the King's right of recovering his debt, and perhaps ought not; but was it ever held, that in acts of general regulation, acts which went to check abuses, and protect the rights of the subject, the power of the Crown could not be taken away by any thing short of express words? (Loud Cheers.) There was no doubt that the prerogative might be taken away by such acts, without any express words for the purpose. This very point had often been decided. In the great case of Magdalen-college (in Lord Coke's Reports) the question was, whether the statutes preventing ecclesiastical bodies from alienating their property extended to the King as well as all others, there being no express words in the statutes to that effect. Magdalen-college had made a grant to Queen Elizabeth; and the point was, whether this grant, being made to the Queen, was within the provisions of those statutes. The judges unanimously resolved, that the Crown was not excepted out of general statutes passed for the protection of the subject, or the redress of wrong. (Hear, hear.) Now he would ask, whether the statute passed in 1791 was not a general statute, passed for the protection of the subject, and the redressing of wrongs? (hear.) There was no decision, no dictum of any judge, no authority of any kind, to be found in any of the books, which asserted that the King was not bound by acts of general regulation. His learned friend had said, that the Crown could not dispense with law: but what had the Secretary of State done? The act of 1791 expressly enjoined, that the magistrates shall visit the prisons within their respective jurisdictions; but the Secretary of State gave orders to the gaoler not to open particular cells. If the magistrates were to discharge a duty in visiting prisons to prevent the abuses of gaolers, would his learned friend say that they were not to see the prisoners in their dungeons? How could they perform this duty, but by seeing and communicating with the prisoners? Could they learn or repress the abuses of the gaoler by making inquiries of the gaoler himself? It would be seen in a moment that this was the very reverse of what the Legislature had directed, if they would turn to the language of the Act, which was clear and distinct. The act was passed to prevent improper conduct in prisons; and certainly a vigilant eye ought always to be kept up towards them, because in no place were abuses so likely to arise. His learned friend had said, that when the act passed, no such cases as these were in contemplation; but that was not the question: it was not what was in contemplation, but what was done, and what was law. (Loud cries of hear.) If any thing wrong had been enacted, it might be amended in a new act but till such new act was passed, they must take the law as they found it. As the act now stood, it was a direct forbiddal of every thing that had been done by the Secretary of State; he had assumed an authority which he did not possess, and had dispensed with the existing law of the realm. He (Sir S. R.) should be indeed surprised if any lawyer could shew him authority for such a doctrine as that which had been advanced by his learned friend. That doctrine would set the Crown above the whole law: it ought not to rest on the support of his learned friend alone, but, unless some authority was adduced, should be at once discarded by the House. (Hear, hear.)

The Solicitor-General, was clearly of opinion, that the right of the Crown to regulate the treatment of State prisoners was not taken away by the act of 1791. The noble lord had admitted that he had found it laid down, that the gaols were the King's; would he say that this expression applied to the four walls only? It could not be so; for in many cases the prison itself was private property, and did not belong to the King. The expression must mean, that the custody of the gaols belonged to the King. His learned friend (Sir S. R.) had not attempted to impugn the doctrine, that anterior to 1791 this prerogative had been exercised without opposition; and surely he would not contend that during his trial a prisoner might be visited and interrogated by every magistrate that chose to enter the prison. It had never been maintained that magistrates possessed such a power before the act of 1791; and if they had it not before, we ought to see what were the intentions of that act. It applied to Penitentiary Houses; and though he would not say that gaols were not included, yet the act was chiefly meant for the regulation of penitentiaries. In order to prevent abuses in the prisons, magistrates were enabled to enter; but was it intended that any magistrate should communicate when he pleased with the prisoners? Without producing any authority, he ventured, with all deference, to say, that the prerogative of the Crown was not taken away by the act of 1791.—The greatest inconvenience would ensue, if ten, twenty, or even fifty magistrates should choose to communicate with the prisoner at once, and interrogate him in what manner they pleased, perhaps at the very time of his trial; and this inconvenience, might occur, if the arguments used on the other side were well founded.

Mr. Brougham said, a more feeble defence of any measure had never been made by the law-officers of the Crown. He stated this without the slightest disrespect to his learned friends, for the fault was not in them so much as in the case they had to defend, which was such, that all their skill, talents, and industry, could not even put a gloss upon it. His learned friend (the Attorney-General) had assumed, that the power of inflicting solitary confinement was part of the law of England previous to 1791, (hear, hear) and that as cruel, as long, and as secret as possible; but who, besides, had ever said that the Crown possessed this power to inflict a torture of all others the most horrible and insupportable? However, they were not now to inquire what the law was previous to 1791; the present question was totally different; namely, whether in the teeth of a specific statute, calling on all magistrates to visit gaols, to make inquiries into abuses, and report the state of what they saw, the King's Minister had power to issue an arbitrary mandate, and say that some of the prisoners should not be visited. Without seeing them, how could the magistrates execute their duty; how could they ascertain whether or no abuses really existed? At all times this check on the abuses likely to arise out of imprisonment was highly necessary; but never was it so necessary, for obvious reasons, as at the present moment. His learned friend had insisted that the King's prerogative was not altered without express words; and his other learned friend (the Solicitor-General) had said, that by the expression of the King's gaols, as the mere walls could not be intended, the custody of the prisoners must. He (Mr. B.) was well pleased with this latter argument; for if the gaols were the King's gaols, even in this sense, to what could the act apply but to the express restraint of the King's prerogative? Then his learned friend had made a quibble on the subject, and had contended that the act was principally directed towards the regulation of penitentiaries. Certainly penitentiaries were mentioned in the first three or four clauses, but the fifth clause ran thus: "And for the better preventing abuses in all gaols," (loud cries of hear,) the magistrates are to enter, to examine into the treatment and condition of the prisoners, and to report any abuses they may discover; but how were those abuses to be discovered, or how were the examinations to be carried on, if the magistrates could examine no more than the four walls or the earth of the prison? If the magistrates had a right conferred on them, were they to have the right only of commanding the prison-doors to be opened, of entering, of examining the mere surface of the prison? It was clear, that when they were ordered to examine into the state of the prisons, they were required to examine the prisoners themselves. His learned friend indeed had not denied that it was possible to oust the prerogative of the Crown without express words. He (Mr. B.) maintained, that the section in question had that effect. If it did not omit the prerogative that had been set up, the magistrates had no means of performing what the statute expressly enjoined them to do. But his learned friend had made a distinction between the offences for which the prisoners might be committed, and arrogated for the Crown the exclusive disposition of one class of offenders. What statute was there for State prisoners? What book, what authority, had ever mentioned the distinction in the custody of all sorts of offenders against the public peace? All prisoners were equally the prisoners of the Executive; they were all arrested, all tried, in the King's name; and it was as illegal, as untechnical, as unworthy of his learned friend's acquirements and abilities, to say that there were two sorts of custody for those who were confined on the score of higher offences, as to say that the King could personally interfere in the mode of custody adopted towards an offender of any description. Was it not as much the interest of the Crown, as of any other branch of the community, that murders, thefts, or burglaries, should be repressed? and would it for a moment be contended that the Crown could interfere in the mode of custody prescribed for those who committed such crimes? This was the first time that two lawyers (hear, hear, hear) had got up a distinction as utterly untenable and absurd as it was oppressive and cruel. Much stress had been laid on the possibility of abuse under the powers granted by the act, if any magistrate should visit a prisoner and communicate with him during his trial. It was impossible to grant discretionary powers that might not be liable to some abuse; but if the magistrates abused the confidence reposed in them, they were also liable to be called to account: and if they entered a prison with improper views, might certainly be prosecuted for misconduct. (Hear, hear.) No one had asserted that all magistrates had a right to enter prisons, but only those belonging to the county in which the prison was situate. The same answer might be made to the objection stated, that magistrates might, under this power, examine prisoners during the course of a long trial. From a late example, it seemed to be thought that a State trial must necessarily be longer than any other; but God forbid that any man, turning a shameful exception into a general maxim, should say that State trials were necessarily long—he called it a shameful exception, for to perplex innocence with a list of 240 witnesses, to add anxiety and distraction to all the difficulties of a trial on which life depended, was bad enough; but it was worse to exclude them, by a long and solitary confinement, from their friends and families, to parade them backwards and forwards, day after day, and to keep them under every aggravation of terror and suspense, until a bungling prosecution was gone through (loud cries of hear). The whole train led for that trial reflected disgrace on those who employed such means (shouts of hear); and its duration had degraded and vilified that which before was respected and venerated—the administration of justice. God forbid, he repeated, that he should argue from the duration of such a trial, to give the Secretary of State power to dispense with the Laws and Constitution of the country.—(Loud and repeated cheering.)

Lord Castlereagh observed, that no suggestion had been thrown out, that any of the prisoners were suffering under any cruelty or hardship; no allegation had been made that there was any abusive or novel exercise of the powers vested in the Secretary of State for the management of State prisoners. The only suggestion had been, that the act of 1791, had altered the general criminal law of the country; a law that had always been recognized by the most constitutional lawyers that ever sat on the bench. He spoke with great diffidence on legal questions; but he maintained, that the warrant of the Secretary of State in these cases was legal and proper, and that all the arguments, from the state of the times, did not affect the question. (Hear, hear, hear, from the Opposition.) Indeed, gentlemen on the other side seemed to take delight in the times, (vehement cries of hear) to make war on his Majesty's Ministers at the expense of the safety of the country. He pretended, that the power of committing for high treason was not confined to the Secretary of State; any magistrate, on proper grounds, might do the same; and if they committed a party to close and safe custody, the gaoler was bound to obey. There was certainly a distinction between the custody of State prisoners, and prisoners for other offences, notwithstanding the manner in which the learned gentleman had philosophized on the subject. Down to the year 1791, there was not one act or decision on which the complaint could be founded. The act of 1791 was the only peg on which they could hang an argument. If, however, that act gave such a power to magistrates, how came the warrant of committal not to be changed? State prisoners were committed to the Tower; and it could never be pretended that the Tower was a common gaol, or subject to the regulations of common gaols. It was a garrison, and not a gaol. The question was, whether, when the warrant committed the prisoners for safe and close custody, the magistrates were not precluded from visiting them. The House would remember that no charge had been made against the Secretary of State. It was the liability of abuse in the interior administration of prisons, and not the oppressive treatment of the prisoners now in confinement, that formed the subject of enquiry. He went along with the hon. and learned gentleman in making a difference between magistrates and other individuals; but paying all deference as he did to the character of magistrates, and believing that no individuals could be more safely entrusted with such power than the present magistrates, yet possessing no assurance of what magistrates might be disposed to do in future times, he could not assume that their future character would be such as to entitle the House to break down such a principle as the one in question. If the magistrates of Berkshire had been obstructed in the discharge of their duty, this House was not the proper place for complaint; the courts below should be applied to; and could it be said, that a magistrate applying there, with the assistance of the hon. and learned gentleman, would not readily obtain a decision on the subject? There let the matter be put to issue, and the question set at rest: but the House would not, in opposition to the known principles of law and justice, go out of their way to decide a question of construction. This was a question of law, and a question of law only, and the House could not, therefore, suffer it to be brought under its jurisdiction. The hon. and learned gentleman had attempted, as he had often done on other occasions, to produce a false impression on the public mind, as to the late transaction (the trial for treason) in the Court below. He would throw no imputation upon the fairness and justice of the decision; but were the proceedings to be called bungling (hear, hear, from the Opposition), because the prisoners were acquitted? He lamented that the trial had lasted so long; but Government ought not to be blamed for what they could not control: the learned Judges themselves had declared that the examination and cross examination of one witness (Castle) had occupied a longer time than they ever remembered. It was not against the excellent and revered administration of justice, that the hon. gentleman spoke, but to impute blame to his Majesty's Ministers; it was one of those unfair attacks of the hon. and learned gentleman, which he (Lord C.) trusted would produce as little impression abroad, as he had reason to believe, it had produced in that House. (Loud cheering from the Opposition.)

Lord A. Hamilton observed, that, after the able and unanswered speeches from his side of the House, he should only say a few words: he would fain know from the noble lord opposite, what possible redress the prisoners could have, if his doctrine was right? The gaols might be changed, and several grievous abuses might be committed; and how could those abuses be known, if gaols were not to be visited? The epithet 'blundering' had been well applied here; and might with still greater propriety be extended to the transactions in a neighbouring country (Scotland).—Though this motion should not be carried—and he anticipated from the state of the House, that it would not—he was glad it had been made, because it would bring the question fairly into public view, and expose the speeches of the opposite gentlemen, as a warning in future, when the suspension of the Habeas Corpus might be contemplated. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. C. Wynn rose amid loud and general cries of question. He said, he should not detain the House long; but he wished to state that he came down to it, without having made up his mind on the question, and wished to hear what the learned gentlemen on the other side had to advance. It was now his decided conviction, that the explicit words of the act could not be set aside by the alleged prerogative. (Hear, hear, hear.) He could conceive cases where vigilance should be used in admitting persons to visit prisoners; but that was not the question. Here, where an imperious duty was cast upon magistrates, he could not see how the Ministers, the Secretary of State, or that House, could even dispense with that duty, far less prohibit it.—The noble lord (Castlereagh) had referred the question to a court of law. When the Ministers of the Crown had given instructions inconsistent with the laws of the land, the principles of the Constitution, and the rights of the subject, it was not to any court of law that the question belonged (hear, hear). It was one of the highest duties of this House to inquire into it. On these grounds he supported the motion.—The House divided:

BOROUGH REPRESENTATION.] Sir F. Burdett moved for leave to bring up a petition of John Greenaway, a voter of Haslemere, relating to a tenement conveyed for the purpose of voting, at the last election. This petition was framed in a different manner from the former, (see page 1368.) and merely prayed the House to revise the law of elections, in order to prevent fraudulent practices.

Mr. Bankes objected to the motion, on the ground that the petitioner acknowledged himself guilty of perjury. (Cry of no.) It also appeared that the matter had been submitted to a Court of Law, and it would be improper to bring it before the House.

Sir F. Burdett said, he had no wish to break through the rules of the House, but the petition appeared to contravene no rules; nor did the petitioner state, that he had committed perjury. He stated, that a fraudulent conveyance had been made to him of property, to enable him to vote; and that after he had voted, an attempt was made to take the property from him. He considered, that if he acquiesced in that demand, he should have been guilty of perjury. Legal proceedings had been commenced against him. Some persons might contend, that this was a breach of trust on the part of the individual. But this man asked for no interference as to the Courts below; he humbly prayed, that the House would take the matter into consideration, to prevent the fraudulent exercise of the elective franchise, whereby ignorant persons, like himself, might be involved in ruin, or in the crime of perjury. It came evidently within the rules of the House to receive this petition; for the practice complained of, interfered with their privileges, and ought to be inquired into, if they wished to preserve any character with the public.

Lord Cochrane considered that all the perjuries committed at elections, emanated from the corruption of that House. There was scarcely a contested election where those who made oath that they neither received nor expected any reward for their votes, did not know at the very time the wages of their iniquity. Unless the House wished the country to be totally demoralized, unless they wished to proscribe all truth and justice, unless they wished entirely to overthrow the Government of this country, they were bound to inquire into the present complaint.

Mr. C. Long (one of the Members for Haslemere) said, he did not see how the House could interfere. The statement was, that the petitioner had received a freehold in trust: but the freehold was now in his possession. His conscience was so tender, that he must apply to the House for relief, while yet he retained the property. If the hon. baronet intended to throw out any imputation against the members for Haslemere, (no, no, from Sir F. B.) he should maintain that none could apply to him. The petitioner wished to obtain a sum of money—this was the tender conscience! An action of ejectment was brought against him for not having paid quit-rent—this was the tender conscience! What then was the object of the hon. baronet? It was merely to make a speech: he was totally indifferent whether the petition was received or rejected, if he had an opportunity of delivering a speech on the subject. He had seen threatening letters from half-pay officers, saying that Sir Francis would bring it before Parliament. (A laugh from Sir F. Burdett and those around him.) It became the hon. baronet, to inquire into the circumstances of the accusers and the accused, before he presented petitions.

Mr. R. Ward (the other member for Haslemere) said, that the petitioner had written a letter so far back as February, 1813, in which it appeared, that he had been in possession of his freehold in 1811, 18 months before the election. If that were so, he must have deceived the hon. baronet. The freehold was vested in him for life, upon paying a quit-rent. He was in arrear for three years, and the ejectment was brought to recover the arrears. With respect to himself, (Mr. Ward) if the forms of the House would allow, as he believed they would not, he wished for nothing so much as to have an inquiry on the subject, in order to give the lie to the petition.

Mr. W. Smith said, suppose the petitioner had no conscience—suppose the statement of the petition false—the question was, whether enough had been disclosed on a subject of the highest importance to the purity of the House, and even to the preservation of morals (hear, hear), to warrant, and to demand an inquiry. Suppose the petitioner a rascal, as far as the honour and purity of Parliament were concerned, they were bound to inquire. Suppose he had been tried under the Grenville act, and committed to Newgate, the question was still of the utmost importance to the House. It might have been tried at the time of the election; but was that the only time? No satisfactory objection had been stated against the petition; and therefore it ought to be received.

Mr. Ward said, in explanation, it was denied that the man was a faggot: he was a real voter.

Mr. W. Smith said, it then came to a question of fact, between the petitioner and the hon. member. An inquiry would ascertain which of them was correct.

Mr. Brand said, that if the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Ward's) statement was correct, the petition, stating a contrary fact, ought to be inquired into, for that very reason. If, however, this freehold was in the petitioner's possession 18 months before the election, it was the only freehold of that kind, as he had occasion to know when that subject was before the Committee, of which he was a member.

Mr. Ward rose to order.

Mr. Brand contended that he was perfectly in order: the hon. gentleman had asserted that the freehold had existed for a certain period; he, on the other hand, wished to state a fact which militated against that assertion, in order to shew the necessity of inquiry. If, therefore, he was in order, he should proceed to state why he—

Mr. C. Long maintained, that if it was the practice to state such facts, it was a most inconvenient practice.

Mr. Brand said, this was a most singular dilemma. The Committee had been precluded from inquiring into the case, and the House, therefore, would not inquire into it. The Committee were precluded by the laws of evidence from inquiring. The House would not inquire because the Committee had not inquired. He did not wish to state what had come under his observation, since the gentlemen opposite had shewn so much delicacy on that point; but to say that any thing in the petition was unfounded, while inquiry was refused, was more an argument against the noble earl (Lonsdale) than against the petitioner.

The Speaker thought it his duty to observe, that the debate seemed to have latterly stepped beyond the rules of the House. The substance of the petition, as opened by the hon. baronet, had occasioned this. There was a peculiarity in the petition, which he thought it his duty to point out. The prayer was different from the circumstances of complaint. If he went into those circumstances, he should go beyond the line of his duty, and disgust the House; but he conceived it right to say, that one part of the petition set forth a grievance as to an individual, while it concluded with praying the House to guard its own privileges. It was for the House to judge, whether the subject was such as they could or ought to receive, or whether the grievance was merely an ejection. On the one side, they were not to be misled by the generality of the prayer, nor on the other to refuse what was fair and just.

Sir F. Burdett replied. He found no good reason for the rejection of the petition, but the reluctance of the House to hear disagreeable truth. If the circumstances of a petition were such as did not meet the wishes of members, a thousand objections were mustered up against it; while, on the contrary, if they were agreeable, the petition was received without any inquiry, and even against the usual forms of the House. He remembered that, last session, in consequence of a petition from the borough of Lympington against the property tax, a counter-petition was sent up from an individual or individuals, stating that the former did not express the sentiments or the wishes of the inhabitants. The latter petition, happening to fall in with the opinions of the majority, was received, even though it had no signature, and prayed for no object. It was then found that the doors of the House should be thrown wide open to the representations of the people; and this informal document, because its contents were not displeasing, was received on that ground, notwithstanding that it was signed by nobody, and prayed for nothing. Against the reception of the present petition, he repeated that he had heard no reason. As to the noble earl (Lonsdale), he had not the honour of being much acquainted with him. He had still less knowledge of the petitioner; and it was from no partiality to the latter, or hostility against the former, that he brought this petition before the House. He was actuated purely by a sense of public duty; and had seized the present occasion, not because it was one of rare occurrence, or uncommon delinquency, but because it furnished an example of the prevalence of a system of seat-dealing, which he thought himself obliged, as a member of Parliament, to expose to the House and to the country. His objection to the noble earl's conduct referred to him, not as a private individual, but as a borough-monger. He objected to his sending members to this House, to vote away the public money, while those whose money was thus voted away had no influence in the election. The noble earl, he understood, had little property in the district, the representation of which he thus disposed of; while his members had an unlimited power of drawing upon the purses of those who were the principal proprietors. He might not even know of the transactions which took place in his name, but it became the House to inquire and to know. He (Sir F. B.) had been accused of believing, without sufficient proof, the representations of this petitioner; but, unhappily, the system of seat-dealing was too notorious to require any great credulity in giving credit to a particular instance of it. It did not require a man to be very credulous to put faith in transactions of this kind, and to believe that a peer who had the power of returning a member to Parliament, would do so. In this case the character of the parties was nothing—it was not to be taken into consideration at all. He would allow the petitioner to be as great a rascal as those who opposed his petition chose to make him; and he would contend that, on that supposition, he strengthened his ground of attack on the system which this person was employed to carry into execution. It would appear, that he at least enjoyed the confidence of the noble earl, when he received his vote: the worse therefore the agent, the worse the transaction in which he was engaged. Indeed, all the branches and transactions of the boroughmongering system were equally bad; there was no conscience, no principle, no justice, truth, or right, to be found in any part of it; and this was only a fair sample of the whole, of which he might say ex uno disce omnes.—He considered it his duty on all occasions to hold it up to the reprobation of the public, and to expose it as a system which, to use a word not a great favourite with him, from its late applications, demoralized the whole community. He thought the petition ought to be received, and should persist in his motion.

“BERKSHIRE to WIT,—At the GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS of the PEACE of our Sovereign Lord the King, holden at ABINGDON, in and for the said County, on Wednesday, the 16th day of July, before Charles Dundas, Esq. as Chairman, Lord Viscount Folkestone, and Thomas Goodlake, James Croft, George Mitford, Adam Blandy, William Morland, John Phillips, Esqrs., the Rev. Wm. Mills, and others their Fellows, Keepers of the Peace and Justices of our said Lord the King, and so forth:—Lord Viscount Folkestone, one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, acting in and for this county, having presented the under-mentioned Report—

To the CHAIRMAN of the QUARTER SESSIONS, held at ABINGDON, on Wednesday, July 16, 1817.

Dear Sir,—In conformity with the provisions of the 31st Geo. III. c. 46, I beg to report to the Court of Quarter Sessions, that Mr. Eastaff, Governor of the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, and Gaoler of the County Gaol at Reading, has, on two several occasions, viz. on the 10th and 14th days of June last, refused to admit me to visit certain parts of the said Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, and Gaol, or to see certain persons therein confined, in direct contravention of the said 31st Geo. III. c. 46, which abuse I hope the Court will, according to the provisions of the said Act, “take into their immediate consideration, for the purpose of adopting the most effectual measures for rectifying the same.”

FOLKESTONE,

One of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Berks.

“Unanimously Resolved, 1. That by the provisions of the Act of the 31st of the present King, c. 46. sec. 5, it is lawful for every Justice of the Peace for this county, of his own accord, and without being appointed a visitor, to enter into and examine the Gaol, at such time or times, and as often as he shall think fit; and if he shall discover any abuses therein, he is required to report them in writing at the next General or Quarter Sessions of the Peace, or adjourned Sessions, which shall be holden for this county.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 19.

SAVINGS BANKS.] Earl Grey presented a petition from the managers of the Savings Bank at Bristol, against certain clauses in the bill now before the House, and principally against the clause forgiving parochial relief to any person depositing money in the bank until his savings should amount to a certain sum. This, the petitioners contended, was directly subversive of the great principle on which the bill was founded—namely, that of affording relief to the country from the pressure of the poor-laws. They also objected to a clause respecting the laying out of the money subscribed.

Lord Redesdale said, he was happy that this matter had been brought under consideration. If the bill were to pass at all, it would be necessary to introduce a clause, that none should be bound by it, except those who claimed its privileges; for if it were to be imperative on all, it would only prevent the establishment of savings banks where otherwise they would be established, and might by that means do harm instead of good; as the regulations which might very well answer at one place, would not be adapted to the circumstances of another.

The Lord Chancellor, advertent to Benefit Societies, stated, that he knew from cases brought before him in the Court of Chancery, that many were induced to subscribe to them from the notion that, as an Act of Parliament had passed, they were perfectly safe. In one or two of those cases only was he able to afford any relief. This was an important consideration with reference to the present bill.

Earl Spencer agreed, that if this bill were to pass, it ought not to be imperative on all who contributed to such institutions; but that those who claimed no privilege under it should be at liberty to dispense with its provisions.

of Parliament, by which such Act can be suspended, dispensed with, or repealed.

"4. That it appears that Mr. Eastaff, Governor of Reading Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, and Gaoler of the County Gaol, has on two different occasions refused to allow a Justice of the Peace for this county to visit certain prisoners confined in the said Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, or Gaol.

"5. That such refusal is, in our opinion, illegal.

"6. That Mr. Eastaff be admonished of the impropriety and illegality of his conduct, and be required to give assurance to this Court that he will not persist therein; and Mr. Eastaff having given the assurance required,

"7. Resolved, That in consequence of the submission of Mr. Eastaff, and his promise that his misconduct shall not be repeated, and considering that he has acted only in compliance with orders which he might think himself bound to obey, but which being in contravention of an express statute, and consequently illegal, are of no force whatever, the Court will, on this occasion, overlook his offence.

"By the Court,

"W. BUDD, Clerk of the Peace."

Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. [1452]

Lord Redesdale said, that benefit societies were to be at liberty under the bill to invest their funds in these banks. Certainly the bill ought not to be imperative.—The petition was laid on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

Lord Sidmouth moved the third reading of the bill for continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

Earl Spencer asked how long the Suspension was made to continue?

Lord Sidmouth replied, till six weeks after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament.

The Duke of Bedford then rose, and spoke as follows:—After the able speeches which had already been made against this bill, he should have refrained from troubling their lordships with any observations, if he could have reconciled it to his sense of duty to give a silent vote, or to suffer the bill to proceed without doing all in his humble power to oppose it. It was true, as had been observed by the noble Secretary of State the other night, that extraordinary cases required extraordinary provisions; but the question still remained, whether the state of the country was such as to justify this measure, and whether it was the proper remedy for the evil? The Ministers had preferred an indictment against the people of England—the Committee, on a grand jury, had found it a true bill; but it was for their lordships to say whether the people were guilty. After having paid the utmost attention to the discussion of the subject the other night, he was very far from being satisfied that there existed any necessity for this measure, and he could not consent to sacrifice the liberties of the country even for a season, though if they went on thus the sacrifice might be perpetual, upon such evidence as they had before them. The reasons in support of the measure were utterly disproportioned to its magnitude. In attending to the arguments of the Secretary of State, and to all the arguments for the bill, he found that, with the exception of those of a noble person who had supported it for its humanity, they all resolved themselves into the ground of necessity—necessity, the tyrant's plea in every case and in every age;—the plea of Napoleon Buonaparte—of the French Directory—of Robespierre and his associates—the Jacobins, whose argument at the bar of the Convention always was, that the first object of law was the public safety. (Hear, hear.) Upon this plea, they perpetrated and defended their enormities; and would it be said, that this was a proper plea to be urged to their lordships, without the clearest and most satisfactory evidence of the necessity? The noble Secretary had, as he recollected, dwelt upon his attachment to the liberties of his country, and he gave him credit for sincerity in his professions; but his views of the Constitution and liberties of the country were very different. If this important statute were to be suspended on occasions where there was no evidence of imperious necessity, the time might soon arrive when they would be told, that there was no need for the Habeas Corpus Act at all; and therefore it became their lordships in time to guard the Constitution. No man more deeply venerated the wisdom and eloquence of our ancestors than he did; and that wisdom and eloquence had been chiefly displayed in securing the liberties of the people. Look at the language of Shelburne, of Saville, of Dunning, and of Fox—names ever to be remembered with the deepest veneration—against these violations of the Constitution. Their lordships, however, were now called upon to suspend the freedom of the whole nation. And why?—because some misguided miserable men, irritated by want, and by the refusal of Ministers last Session to listen to their petitions, had been led into error in a manner which he would not dwell upon, but which had been so ably exposed by a noble friend of his (Earl Grey) the other night. He did not mean to justify the course which had been adopted by some of those persons; but it ought to be recollected by whom and in what manner their conduct had been influenced. If he were asked whether he had no fears for the safety of the State, from the circumstances of the times, he would answer, that he saw no dangerous disposition to diminish the power of the Crown: but there was, he was sorry to say, a strong inclination to abridge the freedom of the subject. As an illustration of this, he need go no farther back than the late debate respecting the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the magistrates of Berkshire, where the monstrous doctrine of a dispensing power in the Crown had been contended for. (Hear, hear.) The bill now before them rested chiefly upon the Report made by a Committee, on evidence furnished by the Ministers. In that Report the Committee stated, that “this intelligence must be considered as resting, in many of its parts, upon the depositions and communications of persons who either are themselves, more or less, implicated in these criminal transactions, or who have apparently engaged in them, but with the view of obtaining information, and imparting it to the magistrates, or to the Secretary of State. The testimony of persons of both these descriptions must be in some degree questionable; and your Committee have seen reason to apprehend, that the language and conduct of some of the latter may, in some instances, have had the effect of encouraging those designs which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting.” This statement was of great importance, and honourable to the candour of the Committee; but was the Habeas Corpus Act to be suspended on such evidence as that? When he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, communications were often sent to Government, that bodies of 5 or 600 men each were in arms, and were attacking the military; and had he listened to such tales, Ireland would certainly have been soon in a state of open rebellion. He, however, had looked to the ordinary laws, and by a moderate and temperate use of them he left the country to his successor in a state of perfect peace. (Hear, hear.) It was with the greatest pain and regret that he had heard a noble lord (Redesdale), who had presided in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and the noble earl (Liverpool) at the head of the Treasury, for whom personally he entertained the highest respect, defend a system of espionage. He used the French word, because, and he rejoiced at it, there was no adequate word in the English language to express the same meaning. (Hear, hear.) Was the noble earl now to take a lesson from Fouché? Was it upon the evidence of such men as Oliver and Castle that this measure was to be adopted? Surely their lordships could not sanction such a system as this—a system totally inconsistent with a free government, and utterly subversive of the liberties of the people. Another part of the Report had been read by the noble Secretary of State with particular solemnity:—“And your Committee cannot refrain from expressing their opinion, that it is chiefly by the means pointed out in the Report of the former Committee, by the widely extended circulation of seditious and blasphemous publications, and by the effect of inflammatory discourses continually renewed, that this spirit has been principally excited and diffused.” Now no man could regard with greater horror than he did such blasphemous publications: but in every period of political agitation there had been parodies on the liturgy, and even on the Scriptures themselves. This must be deeply regretted by every one who had the least sense of morality or religion. He knew that a parody on the Nicene creed had been sent from Norwich to Government, beginning with “I believe in the Earl of Liverpool, master of the Lords and Commons, &c.”—he would not read further: but the truth was, that this was written and published 25 years ago by one who was at that time a jacobin, but who now belonged to the fraternity of Oliver and Castle. Now he had information to communicate on that point which well deserved their lordships’ attention. The person to whom he alluded had boasted of the information which he could communicate to Government, and—would their lordships believe it?—this man had reprinted his own parody in some obscure place at Norwich, and had sent it to Government as a proof of the seditious and blasphemous spirit which prevailed in that quarter. (Hear, hear.) He believed that he was correctly informed on this point. He had the information from a quarter which left him no reason to doubt it. His object was to point out the sort of information on which the Report of the Committee was founded, and on which their lordships were desired to suspend the liberties of the nation. Then the Report stated, “With the fullest confidence in the general loyalty and good disposition, not only of those portions of the kingdom which have hitherto remained in a great degree untainted, but by far the most considerable part of those very districts which are the chief scenes of the operations of the disaffected—a confidence which very recent experience has satisfactorily confirmed—the cannot refrain from submitting to your lordships, as the result of all the information they have received, that the time is not yet arrived when the maintenance of the public tranquillity and the protection of the lives and properties of his Majesty's subjects can be allowed to rest on the ordinary powers of the law." There they had the opinion of the Committee, that the ordinary powers of the law were not sufficient; but then the Committee stated, that the people were generally loyal even in the most disaffected districts. Why then were they called upon to legislate on the contrary assumption? Why should they, when the ground of necessity appeared to be disclaimed in the Report of their Committee, proceed to pass a law unhooking the Constitution of the country? He would yield to no man in loyalty to his Sovereign or in attachment to his country; and the ground of his opposition to the present measure was, that it had a tendency to involve every branch of the Constitution in one common ruin. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The Earl of Westmoreland thought, that after what had been urged the other night in support of the bill, it would have been unnecessary now to have said anything farther on the subject; but he must beg to recal their lordships' attention to some of those arguments. It was admitted on all hands that there might be circumstances under which it would be proper to resort to this measure; and some of the noble lords opposite must allow that there had been times when it was necessary. (Hear from Earl Spencer.) Then the short, dry, and plain question was, is this a proper time for renewing it? It was curious how differently the same argument weighed with different minds. It had been objected to this proceeding, that the act would be in existence at a time when Parliament would be prorogued, or perhaps dissolved: but it appeared to him only the more necessary that the power should exist at that period, because, in case a particular emergency should arise, Government could not immediately apply to Parliament for assistance. Then it had been objected, that a period of peace was a very improper time for such a measure: but whether it was a time of war or of peace was not the question. The question was, whether the exigency existed? But he thought that the reason for such a measure might be stronger in time of peace than in time of war, because in time of peace the country was in a great measure disarmed. (Hear, hear.) The army had been very considerably reduced, and it was the more necessary to give the Government these preventive powers. There could be no question that conspiracies and plots had been and were still carried on to an extent sufficient to excite alarm for the public safety in the minds of all, except in the firm and tranquil minds of the noble lords opposite: this was the conclusion to which two Committees of their lordships had come; and some of the members had been of opinion, upon the first investigation, that it would be a miracle if the necessity of the measure should cease at a period so early as that mentioned in the former bill. Then it might be asked, why the duration of the suspension had not been at first continued for a longer period? The answer was, that Ministers were anxious that these powers should not continue longer than Parliament and the country might think them necessary. It had been said, that the Suspension might be allowed to expire, and that if a particular emergency arose, Government might call Parliament together, and procure a renewal of these powers. But if that were done, then it would be objected, that Ministers had not thought proper to apply for the renewal in a full Parliament, but had suffered the Suspension to expire that they might get it renewed by a few of their own friends. The noble duke had spoken rather in a slighting manner of the first Report of the Committee: but even granting that a mistake had been made as to some clubs and societies, still the substance of the Report was correct. And as to the information given by the noble duke, he might be permitted to doubt whether the circumstances had been correctly stated to him. With respect to that part of the last Report which related to the agents of Government, the noble duke had asserted that the employment of spies was unconstitutional. That was rather an extraordinary assertion, when it was considered that the Secretary of State was called upon to swear that part of the secret service money would be employed by him in detecting conspiracies at home. But the fact was, that such agents had always been employed by Government, and it was impossible to detect conspiracies of this nature without them. He did not mean, however, to justify the conduct of the agents in the extent to which it had in some instances been carried: but the consideration that the leaders might be the agents of Government must operate as a strong check on these secret associations. He would venture to ask, whether Ministers, after gloriously closing a war in which, with but few exceptions, the whole nation concurred, and which was terminated in a manner that far exceeded the expectations of the country, could be held responsible for distress and difficulties which were unavoidable? They had reduced the public establishments far below what the noble lords on the opposite side had hoped for, though they unceasingly called for measures of that description. Was it reasonable, then, to make them responsible for the evils which a diminished expenditure occasioned? A noble earl (Grey) had made it a charge against his Majesty's Ministers, that they had not made commercial treaties at the settlement of the affairs of Europe; that was to say, that they had not forced such treaties on other powers. He would, however, tell that noble earl, that the exports of last year were larger than those of any former year, the year immediately preceding it only excepted. It could not be any falling off in our foreign trade that caused the distress of the country. The same noble earl who blamed Ministers for not increasing our foreign commerce had recommended various things, and particularly the repeal of those precautionary measures which had been passed during the present session of Parliament. Now their lordships would recollect that one of those measures was the bill to prevent the seducing of soldiers.

The Earl of Donoughmore spoke to order. What the noble earl was replying to had no direct reference to the question before their lordships. If the noble earl meant to go over all the speeches that had been made during the session, there was no knowing when the debate would end. He wished to suggest, whether it would not be better for the noble earl to suspend his present speech, and make the points he seemed so much disposed to discuss the subject of separate and distinct motions. There would be the more propriety in this, as most of these topics had certainly nothing to do with the business of that night.

The Earl of Westmoreland was conscious that the course of his argument was quite parliamentary, even though he were not replying to what had been urged on the opposite side; but it did so happen that the noble earl had stated that the repeal of certain measures, one of which was the act against seducing soldiers, would be the best means of quieting the country: he was confident, however, that though that repeal might please a small portion of the people of England, the great majority would regret it. How were Ministers to proceed? If they endeavoured to preserve the peace of the country by the laws against riot and sedition, they found those laws were ineffectual: and if they resorted to the law of high treason, then an outcry was raised against them of oppression and cruelty towards individuals. What interest could Ministers have in suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, except to preserve the public peace? They could derive no advantage from arresting individuals in London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and all over the country. It was only their sense of duty that could make them despise the clamour that was raised against them. Unauthorized statements and newspaper reports were not to be set up against the information possessed by Ministers. There was, however, this advantage in the discussion of these matters—that the public would ultimately be convinced that the Government had nothing in view but the safety and tranquillity of the country.

The Duke of Bedford observed, that the facts which he had stated (respecting the publication at Norwich), were not founded upon loose or vague information. He had good authority for what he had communicated to their lordships.

Lord Sidmouth begged to assure the House, that he had never before heard of the circumstances to which the noble duke had alluded.

The Earl of Donoughmore said, he would not follow the example of the noble earl who had just sat down, by calling the attention of their lordships to all the proceedings of the past and the present Session. He thought the question then before them amply sufficient for that night's discussion. It was not usual for the members of his Majesty's Government to take such wide and irregular excursions, but the noble earl had manifested a wish to reply to something said by almost every noble peer in every debate that had occurred for these five months past. He assured the noble earl, it would not be from any want of respect to him, if he did not follow him through all the details of his speech, but because it would be a waste of the time of the House. There were some things, however, which he should briefly notice. The noble earl had intimated that he would answer for the opinion of Parliament, with regard to the measures to which he had referred. This he was not much disposed to dispute. The noble earl might, perhaps, have means of knowing what that opinion would be; but when he assumed, that the people must feel great satisfaction at what was done by his Majesty's Ministers, he must beg leave to differ from him. What, were the being borne down by an insupportable system of taxation, the being deprived of trade, and a great proportion of the population thrown out of employment, and left without bread to eat, things for which the people of this country felt a strong sentiment of gratitude towards his Majesty's Ministers? Though the noble earl might boast of having had his full share in those measures, it did not follow that the people of England were to approve them, and also to be thankful for being deprived of their liberty after all. To attribute such an opinion to the people, was to malign and stultify them. They would, indeed, be the most stupid, the most brutish people that ever existed, if they did not hear the sentiments ascribed to them with indignation. His respect for their lordships' House would not permit him to mention what other feelings he supposed they might entertain on such an occasion. The noble earl had said, that a period of peace was the most proper for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. This was an extraordinary doctrine, particularly at a time when all the powers of Europe were keeping watch for us on the Continent, when the blood and treasure of this country had been expended to enthrone what was called the principle of legitimacy;—which meant only this—that nations should be handed over bound to those Sovereigns, whose property they respectively asserted them to be. To enable the noble earl and his friends to accomplish this object, the real interests of the British empire had been entirely forgotten. In per-feet consistency with these arbitrary principles, he seemed to consider spies and informers as most useful, necessary, and even honourable appendages of Government. Nobody must in future speak of these gentlemen with disrespect, or regard them as unfit to represent his Majesty at a foreign court. If a person of that kind had engaged with rebels, his turning informer, and betraying those he had perhaps seduced into treason, rendered him highly respectable, and fitted him for a dignified station in society. The noble earl required that these distinguished persons should not be made the objects of any attack. He, however, considered the Government tainted by the employment of these men. This was his sincere opinion, much as he respected the private characters of many of his Majesty's Ministers. The noble earl had, with a sort of triumph, asked, what had brought the country into its present state? That was not the question immediately before their lordships. Whatever had produced the distress of the country, there was no reason for adding to that distress the additional evil of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Had he been present when the former bill was introduced he should have opposed it. Since that bill had passed, however, Ministers had been in possession of the liberties of the country. If there had been any plot in existence, they had had full time to detect and punish it; but what had they done? They selected for trial the strongest case they had to bring forward. On the result of that case their character depended. The verdict was to decide on their motives, their wisdom, their discretion. What was the result? After a patient investigation of seven days, the question had been decided against them in the way most satisfactory to British feelings, by an impartial jury in a court of justice. So complete was the defeat, that three others around whose necks they had endeavoured to bind halters, were discharged without any attempt to adduce evidence against them. They had instituted this trial to support the report of one Committee, and now they had laid before their lordships the report of another, which he might call a Committee of themselves: that Committee had, however, no opportunity of investigating the evidence laid before them, so that their lordships must be just as good judges of the facts as they were. Upon the report of the Committee, or rather of Ministers, it was impossible for any man to doubt that, instead of convicting the people of England, that document would of itself acquit them. (Here the noble earl read nearly the whole of the Report and argued that there was nothing stated in it which could warrant their lordships in passing the bill now before them. He then adverted to the peace that had been made after so glorious a contest, and lamented that its consequences should not only be the destruction of the liberties of Europe, but a loss of our own: instead of consulting the freedom of those nations who had fought in alliance with us, or which we pretended to have rescued from the pangs of despotism, we had established a substantive European inquisition, or had taken our position as the foremost of its abettors. The victory of Waterloo had thus become the means of extending instead of extinguishing oppression; and the monument which went by its name, about which we heard so much yesterday, (the day on which the Strand Bridge was opened, when the Prince Regent, the Duke of Wellington, &c. passed over it), would perpetuate the degradation of Europe, and the triumph of power over the little freedom that remained.)—The noble earl said, he could not believe the evidence on which the Report proceeded, in the statement of what he considered the case of Ministers. These Ministers had happily considered the country to which he belonged as perfectly secure in its loyalty and tranquillity without the suspension of the Constitution. The laws were there considered as sufficiently strong, without any addition of arbitrary power to invigorate the arm of Government. It was necessary in England, it would appear, to protect the peace and safety of the country, by suspending its most valuable rights; but Ireland did not require this extraordinary measure. He did not feel very grateful for the favour, however, when he considered the nature of the law, (meaning the Insurrection Act), which supplied the place of the present bill in that country. He could not forget that men might not only be imprisoned without the common formalities of justice, but transported without a trial by jury.

The Earl of Limerick rose to reply to some allusions which had been made by the noble earl who spoke last to the character of a person (Mr. Reynolds) who ought not to have been so treated. It appeared to him surprising that any member of Parliament should step forward to make such accusations without knowing the case. He would say, without the fear of contradiction, that in a time of great danger and alarm, the individual in question had rendered important services to his country, and that he had not been rewarded above his merits. This individual had originally a considerable fortune, and was connected with respectable society; but having wasted his property, and left his former friends, he had fallen into the company of conspirators and traitors. Being a man of family, and carrying along with him some of the influence of his former situation in life, he was received with open arms and admitted to high confidence; but he soon found that his new associates were intent on dangerous projects, and had formed designs to involve his country in anarchy, massacre, and blood; that they intended to overturn the laws and Government, and to effect a separation of the two kingdoms. He, therefore, reflected on the atrocity of these plans, and determined to retrace his steps. The first time he shewed his intention to repent was after he had dined with some of his companions; on his way home he stated to a friend the desperate achievements that were in contemplation. He told him that he knew the persons engaged in them, and would discover their transactions, provided certain individuals were saved from punishment: and this man laid open the whole plan to Government without fee or reward, or the prospect of fee or reward, upon the simple stipulation of safety for some of his friends. The bloody conspiracy which he disclosed, was thus prevented by his means, and yet he was now called a spy and an informer, and held up to infamy. This, however, was not the only conspiracy he had detected, or the only service he had rendered to his country. The noble person who was then Secretary for Ireland thought so highly of his services, that he appointed him Inspector of Packets at Lisbon, where he was serviceable to Government. What was now his crime? Was it that, being once wrong, he had amended and made every reparation in his power: or was it that he had been returned on the grand jury who found a bill against the prisoners for High Treason? But he was not only accused of having sat as a jurymen, but of being appointed to represent the King at a foreign court. He did not know what foreign court his noble friend alluded to, but he dared to say that the House would be surprised at the place where it was to be found, namely, in the island of Iceland. (Hear, and a laugh.) The noble lord concluded by saying, that he should support the motion before the House.

The Earl of Essex spoke in severe terms against spies and informers, and mentioned particularly Castle and Oliver. That last horrible monster had endeavoured not only to seduce men into treasonable practices for the purpose of gaining the reward attached to the discovery of plots of his own making, but had exerted his influence to induce a wife to prevail upon her husband to attend a meeting that he might be kidnapped. The present bill appeared to him uncalled for in the present state of the country. How different was that state now from 1794, when men of great talents and influence were accused of conspiring against the Government? He was astonished to hear the noble earl attempt to screen such persons as Castle and Oliver from the infamy they deserved.

The Earl of Limerick explained. He said, he had not alluded to those persons.

The Marquis Camden felt it his duty to state what he knew of an individual against whom charges had been brought here, and in another place. That person had rendered important services to Government: he had declared to a friend that a plot was going on, but had declined himself to come forward till compelled: he then disclosed the whole conspiracy when brought to the Castle of Dublin, and gave important information in his own name, which was confirmed in every particular: his evidence to the same facts was given in a court of justice, and remained uncontradicted. He thought it but justice to say thus much; and he would add, that if persons intrusted with the administration of the country were to throw obstacles in the way of those who offered information that might affect its tranquillity, they would neglect their duty, and irreparable mischief might ensue. He was surprised, therefore, to hear the character of this individual, for whom it seemed no opportunity of repentance was to be allowed, confounded with that of Castle.—The noble marquis concluded by supporting the bill, which he considered a measure of precaution, rather than of asperity.

The Earl of Donoughmore explained. When he spoke of testimony, he did not allude to Mr. Reynolds; but he objected, and would still object, to the propriety of his being returned as a jurymen to sit on persons accused of treason, whatever reward his services might otherwise deserve.

Lord Sidmouth said, that as several allusions had been made to Castle and Oliver, describing them both as witnesses against persons accused, and agents of Government in detecting conspiracies, he thought himself called upon to state, that the former never was employed by Government as a spy. He merely came forward as a witness five weeks after the second of December, when all the transactions and plots to which his testimony referred had passed and were under investigation. With respect to Oliver, he certainly was employed by Government to gain information that was important, and to prevent dangers which were imminent and alarming. In describing the character and transactions of that person, the noble earl had depended upon reports in the newspapers, which he had every reason to believe were exaggerated and unfounded in many material points. He did not wish on the present occasion to enter into an examination of them; but he begged the noble lords on the other side to suspend their judgments for a short time, with regard to the transactions alluded to, till more accurate and complete information reached them from other quarters. In their present deficiency of knowledge, their comments might be unjust, and their opinions erroneous.

The Earl of Essex observed, that he had heard the testimony of Castle, but depended on report for the character of Oliver.

Lord St. John said, that whether Oliver was a spy or informer of Government, whether he was authorized or not authorized to behave as he had done, did not appear to him to be decisive of the question, of whether our liberties should be suspended or the Constitution left untouched. Although no arguments could be added to those which were adduced on a former occasion against this bill, and which still remained unanswered, he could not consent to give a silent vote against it; and would still contend, that it was a measure as inadequate to the object in view as it was dangerous to public liberty. It might have been supposed that the issue of the late trial would have decided the House, as it had decided the country against it. It was, indeed, a most extraordinary trial. The pub-

He had testified at once a feeling of shame, of horror, and of triumph at it, which ought to have extended to Ministers, and made them retrace their steps. They had shewn shame that such a trial should have taken place, honor at the villany of the evidence on which the prosecution relied, and triumph that a British jury had so independently performed their duty; that our jurisprudence was still the boast of our country, and that our institutions were adequate for the protection of the subject, and the defeat of power. After such an acquittal, he should have expected that the noble Secretary would have come down clothed in sack-cloth and ashes, humbling himself for his past errors, and abandoning his projected measures. (Hear, hear.) Instead of this, he persevered and demanded the power of dispensing with the rights and liberties of the nation, on the faith of a plot which had been exploded. (The noble lord proceeded to refer to the different periods, during the last century, at which this measure had been adopted, and to point out the striking dissimilarity between the political circumstances of the country at those times and the present.) He begged their lordships to remember, that it was not a plot or a conspiracy which established the present family on the throne. Had it been proposed to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act at those moments of public agitation which followed their accession, namely, the South Sea bubble, the introduction of the excise, the disturbances in Ireland, as well as in Scotland, the proposal would not have been listened to. For the last few years, however, the Government had pursued measures which fixed a heavy responsibility on the noble lord at the head of the Home Department. If the country was in distress, it was his duty to suggest means of alleviating it. Were he (Lord St. John) to advise those means, he should recommend a mild and conciliatory policy, and an impartial system of administering the laws. If a case could be made out of the possibility that the machinery of this bill might become properly applicable in the present circumstances of society, he would, however reluctantly, give his assent to the measure. But till then, he must, upon the grounds he had stated, and from his attachment to a Constitution which he should be disposed to panegyrize, had he not seen panegyric so often employed as a pretext for violating it, give his decided negative to the question.

Lord Somers observed, that although not accustomed often to address their lordships, he was inclined to state his impressions on this occasion; for he could not agree with some noble lords, for whose talents he entertained the highest respect, that because a plot was absurd, it ought therefore to be neglected. Contemptible as the danger might appear, it had actually broken out into insurrection; and had it not been for the measures of Government, that insurrection might have proceeded to open rebellion, and have put to hazard the most happy state of things that ever had subsisted in any country. He was willing to try the question by the result, and would ask what injurious consequences had followed the late suspension, and whether it had not evidently checked, although it had not suppressed, the prevailing tendency to riot and disorder? (Hear, hear.) The Report upon their lordships' table, of which one noble lord had spoken as if he thought it should have been the reverse of what it was, in his opinion reflected the highest honour on the Committee, who, whilst they saw the necessity of continuing the measure, animadverted on the employment of persons in detecting the machinations of the disaffected, because some of those persons had acted improperly. But that people of this description must be employed by every Government was obvious; nor was it a fair representation of the case to argue as if the whole of the evidence came from them, and related to facts which were exclusively within their knowledge. He could not refrain from expressing his astonishment at hearing this bill described as a total Suspension of the Constitution, and as placing all our liberties at the mercy of the Government. The suspension of this particular right, which he admitted was a main pillar of the Constitution, against the surrender of which, he trusted, he should be found to contend manfully—was now proposed but for a short time. It had been argued, that the calling of Parliament together depended merely upon the will of Ministers, and that therefore the duration of the law would be as long as they thought proper! Good God! could such an argument be seriously urged? It might depend upon the will of Ministers whether Parliament should be called a week or two sooner or later, but beyond that, what power had they? (Hear, hear.) Could Ministers do without the Parliament for any length of time? (hear, hear.) He really never had heard so weak an argument. How far could a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act be called a suspension of the Constitution? He had heard it said in conversation, among a certain class of persons, that if the bill passed, there would be an end of the Constitution, and the liberties of every man in the kingdom would be at the mercy of Ministers. Was that the fact? (Hear, hear, from the Opposition Benches.) He would ask again was it the fact? (Renewed cries of hear, hear.) He understood the cheering of the noble lords, but he would still affirm it was not the fact. If it could be supposed that the noble viscount, or any noble lord, from motives of private animosity, would seize an individual and put him in prison for Treason against the State, there, he admitted, he must lie, under the power conferred by that Act. (Hear, hear, hear, from the Opposition.) But, at the same time, could such a thing be imagined? If the present bill were an absolute repeal of the law of Habeas Corpus, instead of a temporary suspension, there might possibly be some temptation to induce a Minister so to act. But was it likely to happen, while the power about to be granted would be exercised under the responsibility that now attached to Ministers? He firmly believed that this bill would not be the means of depriving any man of his liberty, to whom liberty ought to be preserved, or could be preserved, without prejudice to the general liberty of all. The noble lord who preceded him, and some others, on the present and former occasions, had talked about conciliating the people. Conciliation, as far as it was just and proper, he should be ready to adopt. But he would not humour the people by granting whatever they might be inclined to ask. It would be most absurd to do so. 'Let every thing be done that could be done, and let the people see, that so much had been done; but go no further. Flattery was mischievous to every man. Who among themselves could lay his hand upon his heart, and say that he could withstand flattery? He believed no one; and if they, with the advantages of education, and the power of reflection derived from education, could not do so, what was to be expected from the people who possessed none of those advantages? Humour them, (said the noble lord) and you will destroy them. Expectations will be raised which never can be satisfied. From one step they will be led on to another, till they accomplish the final destruction of the State. At present we had a good Constitution, and enjoyed under it a degree of happiness that existed in no other country in the world, and he did not think it could be destroyed by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act for a few months. He should, therefore, vote for the third reading of the bill. (Hear, hear.)

The Marquis Wellesley began by observing, that he had not the vanity to think that he could by any flattery perplex the understanding, or change the opinion of the noble lord who had last spoken; although, from an early acquaintance with him, which perhaps the noble lord had now forgotten, he entertained a sincere respect for his talents, his knowledge, and his integrity. But he would not describe the people of England as the noble lord had described them; nor would he believe that it was in the power of any man, however excellent his character or great his talents, to flatter them either into an abandonment of their rights, or a belief that that was a right which was not so substantially. The noble lord had evidently referred to something which had been said on the subject of Parliamentary Reform; but he (Marquis W.) had been always adverse to any change in the constitution of the other House of Parliament. From the first period of his raising his voice in public, he had resisted every attempt of that nature, and he should not now have alluded to the subject had it not been with a view of repelling the attack of the noble lord. On the first day of the present Session (See page 145) he had described the new principles of Reform, and the doctrine of Universal Suffrage, as a gross delusion, which some had endeavoured unsuccessfully to practise upon a people for whose understandings he had too high a respect to suppose them capable of yielding to it. Whenever such principles should gain an ascendancy, revolution would not be merely commenced, it would be completed, and an end be put to all the subsisting forms of our mixed Government, monarchical, aristocratical, and popular. He repelled, therefore, as well for the noble lords behind him as for himself, the insinuation that they had humoured the people with such notions, or had deluded them with these idle theories. (Hear, hear.) But he had been in some degree diverted by these remarks from that more calm consideration of the subject before their lordships which was so eminently due to its importance. Important indeed it must appear to his mind, when he considered it to involve not only questions of law and justice, of liberty, and every description of policy, but to be in itself a question of public honour, rising above the region of party, to one where no passion and no prejudice should intrude. It was in the present stage of this awful question that he desired to state his sentiments respecting it. The previous discussions upon it had been ably conducted on both sides; and, indeed, by one noble lord, (Grey) who sat near him, had been conducted with transcendent ability. Many new lights had been furnished, much additional information produced, the boundaries, the nature, and character ascertained, of that danger of which there was before no definition, and which was therefore dreadful from its obscurity. The House now came to the discussion of this question, with some distinct information as to the precise nature and character of the dangers, and it had also, to a certain extent, a clear view of the operation of the Suspension Bill upon that danger. Those who now met the noble lords opposite in the contest upon this measure, needed no longer to rely upon loose statement or vague conjecture; they were able to bring fact against fact, and to grapple hand to hand upon its principle and effects. The noble lord who last spoke was willing to concede, because he saw no prospect of abuse; but he (Marquis Wellesley) viewed the question in a far different light. In discussing this great subject, he should first consider the real nature or character of the danger, or mischief as it was sometimes called, and whether it might or might not be prevented or corrected by the existing laws, including among them the recent act regarding seditious assemblies. Secondly, he should inquire whether that danger, and that peculiar system of mischief, could be met by any thing so well as the existing laws. Thirdly, whether, as far as appeared with regard to the operation of this extraordinary measure, it was not clear that it had practically aggravated the danger and mischief it was intended to correct; and lastly, which indeed was the main point of all, and that on which he should most dilate, whether this suspension of the Habeas Corpus must not inevitably produce the dangerous and mischievous effects it was intended to correct. Not merely whether it had not augmented the evil, but whether it had not occasioned it, and that as a necessary consequence. In treating of the first point—the nature and character of the danger—he felt himself called upon to correct some misrepresentations of the arguments of his noble friends. It had been stated, that they had argued against the Suspension Bill, because the situation of the country was not now exactly the same as in 1745, or at any other period when this expedient had been adopted. In fact, the turn of their argument had been directly the reverse: they insisted only that a case should be shewn requiring the infringement of the Constitution: to which only a sort of general answer has been made, “Will you say that, whenever the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended, the Constitution is destroyed?” No noble lord who had resisted the bill had so said; but they had followed up their demand for reasons in favour of the measure, by shewing that none of those existing at previous times applied to the present circumstances of the country. They had maintained that the known precedents had no bearing upon the question—no reference to the existing state of things; and they insisted, therefore, that some other ground should be laid for conferring these extraordinary powers. Entering a little farther into the point of the real nature and character of the danger, it was admitted on all hands that the principles applying to cases of internal rebellion, fostered by external enemies, had no reference to this case: it was not even shewn that any domestic conspiracy had been levelled at the regal power of the King, or at what the law construed into an attack upon it, or into a purpose of dethroning him. What adverse foreign power now fomented discontent? or where could Ministers point out general or even particular combinations to overthrow the Government and destroy the authority of the Sovereign? Stripped of all those circumstances, the case was different from any other known in our history. The noble lord opposite had even gone a great deal farther; for he had admitted that, from the conspiracy recently so much the subject of conversation, he had not apprehended any immediate danger to the Constitution: but he, and those who supported him, added, that such practices ought not to be allowed to pass without check or punishment: for if they were allowed, they might lead to others of a more serious and fearful description. If, therefore, it were urged to-night that the Constitution had been endangered by that conspiracy, it would be said for the first time, and it would be in direct opposition to what had hitherto appeared and been allowed on all sides of the question. He did not mean to deny, on the contrary it was a part of his argument, that these practices were all contrary to law; they were all certainly dangerous, and required the visitation of punishment; but what he contended was, that without this bill they were all within the grasp of the law (hear, hear); and farther, that as far as the designs had appeared in act, as far as any attempt had been made by the ill-disposed, they had been checked and repelled by the ordinary law: where the offence had been moderately interpreted and regularly prosecuted, the parties had indeed suffered the sentence of the law. Upon this part of the argument it was necessary that he should guard himself from misapprehension. Far was it from his intention to state, that because the persons engaged in these offences were of mean birth, and generally of low education; because their means were completely inefficient for the end, they were not criminal, and ought not to be watched by Government with a vigilant and a jealous eye: and even be made to feel the consequences of their crime. But here were no circumstances to excite alarm; no foreign enemy to encourage: no secret intrigues to foment: no persons of rank, education, or talents, to lead and to direct. Then arose the question, did these conspiracies derive support from any circumstance? Were they aided and abetted by any great mass of the population, or was the plot so constructed and combined as to make what would otherwise be ridiculous and contemptible, serious and formidable? Assuredly not. Had any thing more absurd been heard of in the history of absurdities than the scheme recently disclosed? He protested that, had he not seen the testimony upon oath, he could never even have imagined that such a project could have entered into the head of the most frantic bacchanalian. (Hear, hear.) Let us see (continued the noble marquis) how it was compounded and conducted. The plan was to seize on the metropolis at all its great points; to storm the Tower, to take the Bank, to burn the barracks, to conquer the military, to overthrow the old and to establish a new Government: and how was all this to be accomplished? The exchequer of these rebels, or, to speak more accurately, their military chest, contained 31*l.*; their arsenal was filled with six pistols and one old gun: their magazine consisted of about half a dozen bullets in a blue stocking, with a stock of powder in proportion, and that not put into the waggon by a conspirator, but by an informer; and, as the design was to employ combustibles, care was taken that they should only have a deadly operation by stench. The soldiers in the barracks were not to be burnt or blown up, but to be stifled. (Continued laughter.) They were to make themselves masters of the Bank in a singular manner; by the abuse of an instrument that ought to be applied to better purposes, wine bottles, which they were to plunder from the hospitable citizens: and having employed these bottles in the attack, they were to employ them again in the defence of the Bank. (Laughter.) For the assault upon the Tower a notable expedient was hit upon, quite of a piece with all the rest, and certainly not very flattering to the female part of the population; for the forlorn hope was to consist of a number of white-robed virgins; but they unluckily found that the metropolis would not furnish them with a number adequate to the enterprise. They succeeded, however, in producing a dreadful riot, and, as white-robed virgins were not very plentiful, they supplied their places with a few drunken old women, who, issuing from the tipping-houses of the Minorities, discharged volleys upon the military, which I will rather leave to your lordships' imagination than attempt to describe. (Hear, and laughter.) Such being the plan, I will not fatigue the House by detailing the absurdities of the execution; the conclusion, however, was, that one grand division of the army of the rebels was routed by a single trooper, and the remainder received a total defeat, with the loss of baggage, artillery, ammunition, and stores, by the valour of a single alderman. (Continued cheers.) Do I exaggerate? Why, I say that this was more ludicrous than any project ever invented as a burlesque and a satire upon the most absurd of mankind. I confess, the examinations of the witnesses to substantiate it were to me a source of the highest amusement: the plan, execution, and defeat, are parallel only to each other, all equally laughable; the civil, much less the military power, had nothing to do with this signal discomfiture; it was not only sedente et cunctante, but dormiente consule. (Hear, hear.) Even the ordinary vigour of the law was not required for its suppression.—His lordship then went on to inquire how far a vigour beyond the law, as it had been termed, was necessary for the punishment of the offenders in these disturbances: but proceeding a step farther, to other persons charged with conspiracies in other places, he begged to know what there was in the existing law to prevent Ministers from effecting all they wished? Could they not arrest and confine, and thus avert the apprehended mischief; and when the conspirators were brought to trial, had not the old enactments been found competent to all the purposes of justice? Although the individuals engaged in the late disorders in the metropolis had been acquitted, did not their arrest, imprisonment, and trial, with the publication of the evidence in the form in which it had been given to the world, afford a lesson to the people of England of moderation and loyalty, more instructive than all the inflictions the wisest Ministers might be empowered by act of Parliament to impose? By the late proceeding the people of England would first observe the glorious triumph of British justice, as well as the manly fortitude with which the prisoners bore up against prejudice and calumny; but, above all, they would learn that which would make the deepest impression, namely, the dreadful arts by which these unfortunate men were led on to their last excesses. Seditiously inclined they certainly had been, in the first instance, if no higher crime could be imputed; and the lower classes, by the perusal of the evidence, would be taught the danger of taking counsel against the peace and safety of their fellow-citizens, and against the legal and constitutional authorities of the realm. It would instruct them to beware how they allowed men with dubious professions to approach them, and to instil into their ears the poison of sedition or rebellion; it would teach them the truth of the maxim of a great orator, justa causa nunquam esse potest contra patriam arma capere. With these important truths impressed upon the hearts of the people, it might indeed be said, that public order and happiness would be established on a rock which the efforts of a world could never shake, and which the petty fortifications that Ministers were now erecting could neither strengthen nor defend.—These considerations now brought his lordship to another part of the subject, how far these great and unnecessary powers actually instigated to crime, and aggravated the evil they were designed to remedy. The Report of the Secret Committee admitted this fact; for it was there said, that in some instances the operations of persons who gave information tended to encourage proceedings which they were appointed to detect. With regard to the Seditious Meetings Bill, he did not deny that it was a proper and a useful measure: it had produced a salutary effect; but exactly the contrary was the fact with regard to the Suspension Bill: it had not only augmented the evil, but, as he was prepared to prove, that augmentation had been a necessary consequence. The noble lord opposite had denied any connection with the informer Castle; but nobody had charged it: all that was asserted was, that the manner in which he had conducted himself shewed, demonstratively, that his object from the beginning, was to be a spy and a betrayer. The remark would more strongly apply to Oliver, who, being an accredited agent of Government, actually suggested one of the most violent outrages that had occurred in the course of the disturbances. With regard to the general question regarding the employment of informers, no person had contended that their evidence as accomplices might not be sometimes necessary; it might become a positive duty on the part of Ministers to receive it; but at best it was an odious duty, and such testimony ought always to be received with caution: it was a bad foundation for a proceeding in a court of justice; but as a reason for a legislative enactment, there was no epithet of absurdity that it did not deserve. One noble lord had asked, did not the free States of antiquity resort to informers? but, upon reconsideration, he must be aware that the question was at least put rather carelessly; since every person acquainted with history would admit, that if there was one point more than another in which the institutions of those States merited the terms odious and detestable, it was in the administration of criminal justice, and above all, in State trials. The death of Socrates was surely not to be recommended to this country as a precedent of justice and impartiality, or of the purity of the Courts of Athens. The argument of the noble lords who opposed the measure was not against the use of informers, but against the abuse of them; for whether in ethics their encouragement could or could not be justified, it was quite clear that they had always been the most odious instruments of the most odious tyrannies. When once their employment became so rife as at the present moment, it was to be viewed with the utmost jealousy; and, as it had been sometimes said that the people ruled their rulers, it might not long hence be asserted that informers governed the Government. (Hear, hear.) The great argument for the suspension was, that it was a measure of preventive justice; but how could it deserve that character, when, by its authority, persons were dispatched through the country, not to check, but to promote—not to control, but to instigate and inflame,—not to diminish the growth of crime, but to cultivate and cherish it; to bring it to its utmost height and perfection, and to afford Ministers an abundant crop of justice and punishment? (Continued cheers.) Such a state of things would alter the whole course of our judicial proceedings. What had been the grand object for which the people of England had willingly shed their blood, and lavished their treasure? Was it not for the preservation of that Constitution, the love of which had been implanted in their infancy, and had augmented with their reason; and what had hitherto been looked upon as the most beautiful, the most illustrious, and the most splendid jewel in that Constitution? Was it not the pure administration of justice; that justice which the Sovereign himself was sworn to administer in mercy? It was not merely an attribute of his office, or an inclination of his temper; it did not merely flow with his blood from the heroes of whose stock he was descended, but it was a part of the oath which he took at his coronation; and he was bound, therefore, by a sacred and solemn obligation to take care, not only that no injustice was done, but that mercy was mixed even with the severity of the law. But if men were allowed to goad on the innocent to guilt, what became of that heavenly attribute? Would not the administration of the law be then a thousand times worse than the exertion of its utmost severity? No language could fitly describe such unprincipled and disgusting wretches, to whose hands, if the present system were pursued, the lives and liberties of all the subjects of this country would be consigned. Surely it was one of the greatest objections that could be urged against the measure, if its effects were to produce a horde of unprincipled informers, who were interested in raising the crime to the law, instead of adopting the law to the crime. No greater calamity than such a state of things could be contemplated: for then

British jurisprudence, instead of being a beautiful and perfect system, would become alumna licentie, comes seditionum, effrenati populi incitamentum, quæ in bene constitutis civitatibus non oritur. Would not this state of things be one of the strongest incentives to discontent? When a man was arrested, imprisoned, and denied the possibility of clearing his character, and liberating his person by the verdict of a jury, and when all his countrymen saw that such might be their fate at no distant period, was it not giving to the people a real motive for discontent, and an excuse for disorder? The only advantage which Ministers gained was, that they need not bring their prisoners to trial; but in what way could this be beneficial? Did it not, on the contrary, create an unnatural ardour in the public mind, which engendered the reptiles whose purpose was to ensnare the innocent and inflame the guilty? Upon every ground on which he could consider the subject, he felt himself bound to oppose the bill. His objections were founded, not only on the great questions of political liberty, of the freedom of individuals, and the preservation of the Constitution, but he added to those objections his considerations of the peace and the honour of the country, of the conscience of Parliament, and of the safety, security, and prosperity of the realm. (Hear, hear, hear.) The Earl of Harrowby said, he felt it difficult to give a silent vote on this question after what had fallen from some noble lords opposite. The noble marquis had made a speech of considerable wit and much eloquence; and he enjoyed the pleasantry of it: but the whole case did not rest on what had passed in London; it depended on a view of the general state of the country. An instructive historical detail had been given of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, but it was not applicable to the present occasion. Were this the first proposal for the suspension, the argument might be different; but now the measure rested on precedents, and was not to be condemned on comparisons and similitudes. There were cases in which danger was less to be feared from despotism than from anarchy. The plain statement was this—that there was a conspiracy of those without property against those who possessed it. (Hear.) The conspirators might not be likely to obtain success, yet might commit dreadful evils, against which their want of education was no security. The successful revolts of such people, in ancient Greece, must be familiar to the minds of their Lordships; and it was notorious to all, that the taking of the Bastille, in France, was entirely accomplished by persons of that description. In our own country, we might look at the effects of the rebellion of Wat Tyler and Jack Cade. A shoemaker (alluding to Thomas Preston, see the note, page 1280) might not be likely to form an Oliver Cromwell; but none could doubt the existence of an extensive conspiracy. He might also allude to the case of Dequard, and he would ask, was there, or could there be a plan more absurd than the one he had formed, yet, happily, he was baffled. It was useless, then, to argue that no danger could arise from conspiracies that were formed by the lowest classes in society. The danger now was in a combination for insurrection, which might not produce total destruction; for he believed the good sense and loyalty of the great body of the people would prevent that; but the hands of Government required to be strengthened: they could not venture to let sedition rise into rebellion. With regard to the insurrection near Leeds, he denied that it had been produced by Oliver: the fact was, Government knew every thing connected with it, before Oliver was on the spot. He could not concur in the reproaches thrown upon spies, for he was decidedly of opinion that they were more or less necessary in every free country (hear, hear, from the Treasury Benches). He trusted he should no more hear it said, that this person was employed by Government to excite disaffection in the country, though at the same time he was ready to admit, that in the difficult situation in which persons who acted as spies were placed, they might occasionally use language unguardedly, which tended to excite to seditious practices. Perhaps this might have been the case with the person alluded to; but he would never admit that that individual had begun the plot, as it was formed before he left London. It had been said, that Ministers had done nothing for the people; but, critically situated as they had, they deserved some credit. They had not, in the circumstances of the country, agreed to propose expedients of raw legislation to check foreign importation, under the notion of encouraging home products, though the doors of all the public offices had been besieged on that subject. They had attempted only what was practicable. They had abstained from any proposition respecting the Poor Laws; and he did not know that they would propose any measure on that point, as a sudden alteration might be dangerous. They had shewn that they would go to the utmost extent, consistent with the convenience and necessities of the Government, in every practicable measure of reduction. They had endeavoured to procure work for the labourer, and to provide for such as could not find employment, resources which conspirators would have destroyed. Distress had been made an instrument of sedition, and the press every day said that the Government was the cause of the distress—Government, who by their exertions had so greatly contributed to the events of one day, by which a mighty hostile empire was overturned, and the liberties of Europe restored. What was meant by speaking of chains being riveted in Europe? Was it a contrast between the liberties granted by Buonaparte, and the despotism of Louis XVIII? Constitutions had been formed, which perhaps left too little strength to the Governments. How were the people of Europe worse than they were? We had not shed our blood and expended our treasure for slavery either at home or abroad. To say so, was to sow the seeds of discontent. The intent of the present measure was to preserve our liberties and our blessings, and to prevent treason and rebellion from blighting the rising and opening buds of our renewed prosperity.

Lord Holland said, he would not detain their lordships long at that late hour. He thought the noble earl was, at first, stating the question fairly, so that no difference might arise on that subject, and that the debate might be short: but he seemed afterwards to depart from that—and to mistake the arguments which had been used. He [Lord Holland] did not wish to meddle then with the last of the noble earl's topics—the merits of the Ministers respecting the state of the country since the peace; nor the effects of the battle of Waterloo; neither did he wish to say any thing about the buds of prosperity now sprouting up from that glorious victory. But it was a strange description of the consequences of that great battle, to rest upon the measures of Ministers to keep down insurrection, and of their disinclination to adopt schemes of improvement, and so forth. Though he had always felt an interest in the liberties of other countries, he should not then take up the gauntlet which the noble earl had thrown down. He was quite prepared on that point; but on a question so deeply affecting the liberties of Englishmen, he had nothing to do with the Continent, or whether the Government of Buonaparte or that of Louis XVIII. was the best. The true questions were, what was the nature of the danger here; and then, whether the remedy proposed was the proper one? There was nothing scarcely to be said, if a great extent of danger was proved. The noble earl stated the evil as a question between people of property and those of no property. A more unstatesmanlike and dangerous declaration he had never heard. If such were the case, would the noble earl say, that Ministers could shut up all the instigators in prisons, under the act, and get rid of the multitude? He should not examine the precedent of 1794 minutely. He was not old enough in Parliament to have a personal knowledge of it. But he could easily remind the House that we were then at war, and if a conspiracy then existed in the country, there were some plausible grounds for the measure. Indeed there might be some sense in that bill, because it declared that the conspirators at home acted in concert and connexion with our enemy—France! The effects of that remedy might be obvious to those who believed in the danger; because, though the people conspiring might, however low and mean, be supposed very numerous, yet it must be only a few of them who conducted their affairs, and managed the correspondence with a foreign power. If, therefore, by a few apprehensions, the leading people were secured, the treasonable correspondence would be laid hold of, the thread of the conspiracy would be cut, and the life and hope of it destroyed. But how did the present case stand? It had been said that Ministers drew up no bill of indictment against the whole nation—very well. There was indeed a candid admission in the Report of the general good disposition of the people, as well as that only a portion of the disturbed districts was tainted.* But then, the bill of indictment was drawn up against a few, and the liability of the punishment affected all. (Hear.) He had heard some observations with pain from the noble lord on the cross-bench (Lord Somers). He was convinced that that noble lord had too high a value for independence not to know and to feel that it was a very great and grievous hardship to be exposed to any kind of persecution. It made men less fit to breathe in a free country (hear). The noble lords opposite wished to put their trust in the virtues of the noble viscount (Sidmouth): but no personal reasons could be sufficient to render the liberties, not only of the unfortunate and deluded poor wretches imprisoned through the tainted breath of a vile informer, but the liberties of all the people of the land, liable to violation and suppression. The noble lord (Westmoreland) had stated, that there ought to be no objection against the measure, unless it could be fairly alleged that the motives of Ministers, in proposing it, were corrupt. He (Lord H.) knew nothing about the motives of Government, but, constitutionally speaking, he had a right to impute the blackest designs whenever the measures were injurious in their consequences. As to what had been said about informers, he thought that his noble friends had been a good deal misunderstood. They had never said that a spy or an informer should in no case be made use of; but they had reprobated that system of espionage which had now for the first time been avowed as a regular instrument of administration. Nor was this the only new doctrine broached on the present occasion. He was old enough to remember more than one instance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus; and he perfectly recollected, that in all former instances it had been solemnly stated, that it was never intended to take up men who were not to be tried. He was well aware that this rule had, in numerous cases, been grossly violated, and that but very few of those who were apprehended had actually been brought to trial. Still the Ministers put on a show, at least, of virtue: but even this hypocritical pretence was now done away, and they were now arrived at the boldness, that the act would be, in the fullest sense of the word, an act conferring the power of arbitrary and indefinite imprisonment. (Loud cries of hear!) The noble earl who spoke last had taken advantage of the candid admission of the noble marquis, that danger perhaps existed: but the fact was, as had been so ably argued by the noble marquis, that the danger was not one which required such a remedy as that proposed.

The noble earl at the head of the treasury had talked a good deal about the French insurrection of the 6th of October, 1793, as if it had been one in which the mere populace were alone concerned. Now this was not the fact: for it was notorious, that one of the highest persons in France, the richest and the noblest, a prince of the blood (he meant the Duke of Orleans), was the active instigator of that mob. There was another insurrection somewhat prior to that, which he (Lord Holland) thought equally applicable to the present case, though the noble earl had adroitly passed it over. He was not fond himself of referring to the French revolution, for really it required some circumspection in language, in order to avoid all those disagreeable imputations which were so readily applied to those who alluded to it. Indeed, unless a man, when he spoke of that event, began by calling it "detestable, atrocious, abominable," he ran the risk of being called a revolutionist, or a jacobin at least. (A laugh.) However, he would refer to this insurrection of the 14th of July, which, if he remembered right, was directed against the Bastille, by the indignation of the populace: that event could not be prevented by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, by the destruction of personal liberty: no, it was brought about solely by the existence of arbitrary imprisonment, by the desire of abolishing so great a grievance as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord on the cross-bench had expressed great alarm about the prevalence of such doctrines as those of Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. He (Lord H.) was not at all more favourably disposed to such visionary schemes than the noble lord himself: but he could never allow that the existence of such opinions was a reason for suspending the liberties of the whole nation. Even if such doctrines were universally popular, he should think it a bad mode of proceeding to attempt to stifle the universal voice by repressive and tyrannical enactments:

Strangulat inclusus dolor, atque exæstuat intus.

And, for his own part, he would rather have to meet an open insurrection, than to stand in constant awe of the deep broodings of sullen discontent and suppressed resentment. (Loud cheering.) Rebellion was a great evil, but the greatest of all evils, in his mind, was a permanent despotism; and whatever tended to so baneful a result, ought to be checked in its very inception. This was the great ground of his opposition to the present measure. It could not leave the people as it found them: it must make them either resentful for the curtailment of their rights, or else utterly indifferent about their dearest privileges. He should be sorry to hear any man hereafter saying, "Well, after all, this suspension of the Habeas Corpus, about which so much fuss has been made, has done no great harm that I can see. I feel quite as comfortable as before." He hoped that there was no noble lord who would not be shocked that an Englishman should ever be reduced to entertain such a feeling. He hoped that there was no noble lord who did not think that the vigilance and jealousy which the people of England exercised over every thing that regarded their liberties was their noblest characteristic, and one of the grandest excellences of a free constitution. (Hear, hear.) The noble earl had said, that the indictment was not against the whole people of England. What then did he mean? Did he intend to assert that any partial blot in the Constitution was to be a reason for abolishing it altogether. (Hear, hear.) Did noble lords believe that a time ever existed when discontent was not to be found somewhere among the people? when some persons, at least, did not loudly and bitterly complain of the inequality of fortune? when, in fact, there were not some speculative persons who preferred a republic to a monarchy? Why then should such circumstances be alleged as sufficient to justify the suspension of that privilege which distinguished this country above every other in the world? Was the Habeas Corpus to be considered a mere bauble, a pretty dress to wear on a fine Waterloo show-day? (A laugh.) And was it on all other occasions to be locked up as a thing of no use or value? (Loud cries of hear.) It was because he loved and admired the Constitution, that he opposed the present bill: the other party professed to admire it too, but he suspected his own admiration to be the most sincere and genuine, because he believed that the Constitution was suitable to turbulent as well as calm seasons, and might be relied on for safety even in times of the greatest danger. (Cheering.) He would not trouble their lordships any farther, than to protest that he regarded the present suspension with great distrust; and that he, in his conscience, believed that there had been no instance since the Revolution when such a measure was less called for by circumstances, or was less likely to be beneficial in its results. (Hear, hear.)

The Lord Chancellor said, he gave every credit to those who opposed the bill for their love of the Constitution, although he thought their opposition altogether unfounded. He was not so absurd as to support the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, because there were many individuals who wished for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, and many others who preferred a Republic to a Monarchy. There were other and very different grounds for the measure. While he allowed to the noble baron who had just spoken, that the Constitution recognized the writ of Habeas Corpus (securing, and not creating, to the subjects of the realm the right of prompt trial, for the offences with which they might be charged), as essential to the complete system of our liberties, it also recognized the principle, that we must be content now and then to sacrifice the temporary enjoyment of its benefits, in order to enjoy them for a more durable period. The circumstance of the frequent suspension of the Act was a proof of the recognition by Parliament of this principle. In the reign of William III. it had been suspended three times in one year, though for very short periods. It had been suspended in the seventh year of King William; and again in 1718, in 1721, in 1745, and repeatedly in the present reign. And, if he had not made a false estimate of the present dangers of the country, they were much greater than at any of the periods at which the suspension had hitherto taken place.—The true character of the measure was, not that it inflicted an evil on the great body of the people, but that it was intended, for the sake of the great body of the people, to secure their interests and happiness. In former reigns when the Habeas Corpus was suspended, although great dangers existed, yet they were not such as to threaten the destruction of the throne, the altar, the nobility, and all the institutions of the State. But if those who were now endeavouring to obtain their objects, not by reasoning, but by physical force, were to succeed, all the sacred institutions, all the constituted authorities of the realm would be overturned.—Adverting to the observations which had been made on the late trials, and on spies, accomplices and informers, he observed, that long before he had heard the name of Castle, he had stated to his colleagues, that he considered the transactions which followed the meeting at Spafields to be, in point of law, high treason. With respect to spies, he allowed that they were liable to all the epithets which had been bestowed on them. But he maintained that Government, when they knew of the existence of a plot in the country, were bound to employ such persons for the purpose of detecting and defeating it. It was quite a different thing to stimulate such an individual to go further. As to the person in Yorkshire, respecting whom so much had been said, their lordships would do well to suspend their judgment until the proper time should come for his noble friend to explain the circumstances of the case, and to remember that the authority of a country newspaper on the subject was very bad authority indeed. The Suspension of the Habeas Corpus had enabled Government to deprive bodies of men in arms of their leaders—persons of greater ability than some noble lords seemed to believe. Was this danger over? If the existing law were sufficient to punish the offences of these persons, and to prevent the commission of farther crimes, then the Bill before their lordships ought not to pass. But if bodies of armed men, 300 in number, continued to assemble, whom it was impossible to prosecute in a male, either for High Treason or for misdemeanour; and, by taking from them their leaders they could be broken up, their plans disconcerted, and themselves saved from punishment, was not that as great a case for the continuance of the Suspension as it was possible to imagine? The noble baron had hinted at the probability of a Bill of Indemnity. It was time enough to talk about that when it should be asked for. He did not mean to deny that he believed it must be given; otherwise the Secretary of State might, as well quit his office at once: for there were many cases in which he would have sufficient proof of the necessity of acting on the Suspension, but not legal proof of that necessity. HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, June 19.

MARRIAGES REGULATION BILL.] Sir J. C. Hippisley brought in a bill for the further regulation of marriages to be solemnized after publication of banns of matrimony, which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONS CONFINED FOR TREASON.] Mr. H. Addington, pursuant to an address of the House (of the 11th inst.) presented the following "account of the number of persons now in confinement in Great Britain, by warrant of either of the Secretaries of State, or of six Privy Councillors,—detained under the provisions of an act, passed in the present Session of Parliament, for enabling his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government;—with their ages, and the places of their confinement."

In the gaol at Reading, 1, aged 26; 1, do. 38; 1, do. 54.—In Tothill Fields Bridewell, 1, aged 26; 1, do. 51; 1, do. 35.—In the gaol at Horsemonger Lane, for the county of Surrey, 1, aged 73; 1, do. 54; 1, do. 20; 1, do. 33.—In the gaol at Chelmsford, 1, aged 30; 1, do. 27; 1, do. 22; 1, do. 31.—In the gaol at Gloucester, 1, aged 18; 1, do. 30.—In the House of Correction for the county of Middlesex, 1, aged 34; 1, do. 33; 1, do. 29; 1, do. 49; 1, do. 39; 1, do. 31; 1, do. 30; 1, do. 60; 2, do. 36; 1, do. 35; 1, do. 48; 1, do. 46.—In the gaol at Exeter, for the county of Devon, 1, aged 37; 1, do. 24; 1, do. 35.—Total number of persons in confinement, 32.

ROCHESTER PETITION.] Mr. Barnett presented a petition from the city of Rochester, against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COPY-RIGHT.] Sir E. Brydges moved for leave to bring in a bill, "to alter and amend an act passed in the 54th year of his present Majesty, so far as regards books published before the act of Queen Anne, respecting the claims to eleven copies of the said books, and also to very limited editions of books."

Mr. Banks and Mr. Peel opposed the introduction of the bill.

Sir S. Romilly was astonished at such opposition, when he considered the nature of the question, and recollected that by the present law, no man could publish without giving away at least eleven copies of his work. It was no doubt desirable that the Universities should be furnished with books; but certainly if this were to be done, it ought to be at the public expense, not at that of the poor author. The tax thus imposed on writers was founded on a barbarous principle, and surely deserved the attention of the House.

Lord Palmerston said, the real question before the House was, whether they should consent to a repeal of the law passed in 1814, for in truth the proposed measure, though described as a design to amend and alter the law, was actually intended to repeal it. He could never allow it to be said, that an Act like the present, which went to promote the interests of learning, was founded on a barbarous principle.

Sir F. Burdett said, he had heard nothing to justify any opposition to the present motion, which was founded on the strictest justice, and was so clear a case that he was almost ashamed to say a single word upon it. The question at issue was simply this—Whether shall a man derive the fruits of his labour, and enjoy them, to the advantage of himself and family, or be compelled to give them away to others? When the House considered the character, situation, and rank of those public bodies who claimed the copies, and how able they were to pay for them, he was persuaded that they ought to hesitate before they rejected the motion.

Mr. J. Smyth opposed the motion, because he saw no grounds whatever that could be alleged in its support.

Mr. Ponsonby said, this was the first time he had heard that literature was promoted by authors being compelled to give their publications to the Universities. For those learned bodies he felt a sincere respect, but he could not help saying, that they were always disposed to take a great deal, while they gave but little. If the Universities required these books, they should pay for them, or the public should; and, for his own part, he could have no hesitation in consenting to a grant for this purpose. But he did not see why the Universities should not purchase their books as well as individuals. It was truly absurd to say that literature was promoted by their receiving these copies from poor authors.

Mr. Croker thought the right hon. gentleman had not read the act of Queen Anne, which expressly stated that it was made for the encouragement of literature. Besides, he had not recollected the advantages which authors obtained by that act in the extension of their copy-rights. It was not fair to call this a tax on authors.

Mr. Ponsonby.—Sir, I know the act, but I remember that that act is called one for the encouragement of literature; and, Sir, calling and doing are two very different things. If people are to be judged by what they are called or profess to be, we in this House should be considered the most economical set of persons in the world, for we are constantly talking of economy. But, Sir, to prove what I say, though we talk of economy, we shew very little attention to it, and profess what we do not practise. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham considered, that his right hon. friend (Mr. Ponsonby) had as much knowledge of the act of Queen Anne, as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Croker) could have, but the provisions of the last bill ought to be amended, as they imposed a very heavy burden upon authors. It certainly was not any encouragement to learning, to oblige poor men to supply the Universities with books, merely that the funds of those rich and well endowed bodies might be spared. The burden ought to fall on the consumer, not on the grower of the article, if he might use such an expression. He felt it his duty to support the measure, as one extremely proper and just in every view.

Mr. Finlay opposed the motion, observing, that the contribution of eleven copies was not so heavy a tax as by some it was supposed to be, as, in most cases, it was little more than the expense of paper and printing.

Mr. C. Wynn conceived that it was absolutely necessary to revise the act, in consequence of the manner in which its provisions had been executed. Even the friends of that act must see that it needed revision. The Universities, who had ample funds, refused nothing at the hands of poor and frequently distressed authors, but music and novels. (Hear, hear.) It would be much better to give those learned bodies a pecuniary composition, which might be used for the advancement of learning.

[SPIES AND INFORMERS.] Sir F. Burdett rose to call the attention of the House to the employment of spies, as allies of Government, in the maintenance of social order. (Hear, hear.) While such instruments were made use of, it was impossible that any man's property or person could be safe: and the misdeeds of one of those miscreants, whose conduct had lately been brought to light, proved but too plainly the truth of what he asserted. Under these circumstances, and hearing that the noble lord had attempted to defend the conduct of such a man as Thomas Reynolds, of Welbeck-street, he should be glad to know of Ministers, whether those spies had their authority for making use of the names of individuals? (Loud cries of hear.) A transaction of this sort had occurred, in regard to which the state of the times rendered it necessary for him to vindicate his own character, however contemptible and unworthy of notice those persons might otherwise be. It appeared then, that Oliver, the fellow of Reynolds, had gone about the country introducing himself with Sir F. Burdett's compliments. After what had already come out, it was impossible to say how far this man might be authorized by, or associated with, the Government. If he acted on authority, the infamy of such transactions was mutual on the employer and the employed; or rather the Government that could employ such agents, the terror, scourge, and pest of society, was even more culpable than the wretched agents themselves: and if universal justice ruled the bill, the noble lord should be tried with his creatures, Castle and Oliver, for their conspiracies against the subjects of this kingdom. (Hear, hear.) If the employers of these men had any feeling, or any conscience, they would have shunned the assistance of such unworthy allies; for they might beforehand have been sure that such agents would go beyond their instructions, because it was their obvious interest to do so: if they did not promote treason, their employment was at an end. (Hear, hear.) A jury of able, independent, and honest men, had shewn their sense of the infamous purposes for which these spies had been employed.

The Speaker rose to order.—He had listened to hear if the hon. baronet meant to make a motion or ask a question; and, conceiving, at all events, that the matter was one in which the hon. baronet was personally concerned, he had refrained, perhaps longer than he ought to have done, in reminding him that he was proceeding to some length without any motion before the House. If the hon. baronet's object was to ask a question, he put it to his candour whether he had not transgressed all reasonable bounds for such a purpose?

Sir F. Burdett thanked the Speaker for the very handsome manner in which he had set him right, but thought himself not wholly inexcusable on such a subject, in which he was so closely concerned. The question he had to ask the noble lord was, whether Oliver had the authority of Government for making use of his name?

Lord Castlereagh replied, that if the hon. baronet's name had been improperly used, he might attribute it to other grounds than the command of his Majesty's Ministers. He was ready to justify the transactions that had taken place, so far as his noble friend, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, was concerned; and he was certain that that noble lord would never abuse the public confidence that had been placed in his hands. If the peace of individuals had been disturbed by treason in the country, none could lament it more deeply than himself; but he should not be deterred by any thing the hon. baronet could say from taking measures to ensure the peace of the country, though those measures might disturb the peace of traitors, or even involve the hon. baronet's name.

Mr. Brougham asked, whether, in consequence of what had passed in that House, his Majesty's Ministers had taken the usual steps with a view to bring the person employed in these criminal transactions to condign punishment, should the atrocities alleged against him turn out to be true?

Lord Castlereagh assured the House that his noble friend had never authorized any act blameable in itself; and if any improper conduct in the party alluded to, or any other, fell within his notice, it would meet with due reprehension.

TITHES.] Mr. Curwen, after disclaiming the least intention of infringing on the property of the Church, and stating that his object was to put an end to that extensive litigation which was not more injurious to the parties engaged in it, than to the interests of general morality and religion, detailed the inconveniences which resulted from the existing laws, by which Church property was placed in a situation so different from that of other property, the title to it rendered so much more difficult of proof, and the contested claims to it made the subject of the decision of a court of equity, instead of a Jury; and instanced several cases in support of his argument. The hon. gentleman concluded, by moving for leave to bring in a bill "for the amendment of the law in respect to Tithes."

Sir W. Scott said, he would not resist the motion; but, although he coincided in much of what had fallen from the hon. gentleman, he should be sorry to have it go forth to the public, that he could ultimately agree to the great innovation which the bill proposed to make.

Sir S. Romilly supported the motion, though he feared it was too late in the Session sufficiently to discuss so important a subject. He confirmed all the statements of the hon. mover with respect to the inconveniences of the present law, and particularly the circumstance that long possession, which strengthened all other property, weakened that of the Church; since, instead of a prescriptive title being obtained in 60 years, it was necessary to go back 600 years, to the reign of Richard I. in order to establish a claim. Adverting to the tedious litigations to which the uncertain tenure of this property at present gave rise, he mentioned the case of a clergyman, with twelve children, whom he took the liberty of advising, not, with such a family, to incur the risk of a Chancery suit, and who told him in reply, that, circumstanced as he was, he should never have thought of it; but that he had commenced the process when he was a bachelor.

Mr. Lockhart, after passing an eulogium on the talents and authority of the right hon. gentleman (Sir W. Scott) in differing from whom on such a subject, he was conscious that he was in great danger of falling into error, contended, that such a bill as was now proposed would be most valuable, in order to settle the titles to Church property, and put them on the best foundation. The motion, therefore, had his most cordial support.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

LANDLORD AND TENANT LAW.] Mr. Lockhart rose to call the attention of the House to the mode of levying distresses for rent. He observed, that in the metropolis poor tenants frequently endured the greatest oppression, without any benefit being derived by the landlords from their sufferings. They were plundered by the brokers employed to distrain. He then read an account of the costs which an unfortunate journeyman tailor had to pay in consequence of a distress for rent. The rent due was 2*l.* 13*s.* and the costs of the distress were 4*l.* 8*s.* The result was, that all the unfortunate man's little effects were sold; that he, his wife, and children, were turned into the street; and all that the landlord obtained of the 2*l.* 13*s.* due to him, was 6*s.* 6*d.* He had no wish to diminish the security which landlords had, and ought to have, for their rent; but he wished to remove the evil which he had been stating; and he was sure that the poor man could obtain no remedy unless the Legislature interposed, and passed some short act, which would be easily accessible to him. The hon. gentleman then moved for, and obtained, leave to bring in a bill to regulate the costs of distresses levied for the payment of small rents.

STATE OF IRELAND.] Sir J. Newport in rising, pursuant to his notice, to call the attention of the House to the State of Ireland, said, he could not but regret to observe so thin an attendance of members, when a question of so much importance was to be discussed. It was his sincere wish, before the Session closed, that some security should be given by Ministers and Parliament, that early in the next Session the affairs of Ireland should be taken into the serious consideration of the House. Sixteen years had elapsed since Ireland was first united to this country, and during that period no steps had been taken to redeem the pledges given at the Union. No man would say that Ireland ought to be allowed to remain in its present condition. It, in many respects, resembled individuals; and Ireland, like a diseased individual, if not now attended to, would soon force itself upon their attention. He did not mean to hold out that any thing like physical force was to be dreaded: the danger was to be apprehended from the dilapidated state of the finances. If, after a long and perilous war and during a profound peace, we were not prepared to look into the situation of that part of the kingdom, when should we be prepared to look into it? If ever any period could be proper, it must be the present. Ireland must be a source of weakness instead of strength, till Parliament paid proper attention to its interests. It was endowed by nature with every thing to make it a valuable portion of a great empire; and was inhabited by a race of men not inferior to any on the face of the globe. It was of little moment to bring forward statements of disturbances, and pass insurrection bills; they ought not only to make themselves acquainted with the evils, but to inquire into the causes of them. It was not by perpetually abandoning the Constitution that they could hope to keep Ireland tranquil. However necessary insurrection bills might be to put down local disturbances, they could never be the permanent law of the land. The right hon. baronet concluded with moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, praying, that his Royal Highness will be pleased to direct such deliberate and accurate inquiry to be made, during the prorogation of Parliament, into the state and condition of the people of Ireland, as may enable this House, at the commencement of the ensuing Session, to enter with vigour and effect into a complete investigation of the causes, nature and extent, of the evils which afflict that part of the united kingdom; and to devise such salutary and efficacious remedies, framed in the spirit of British constitutional legislation, as may appear to our dispassionate judgment most adequate to effect their complete and permanent removal; and in the impressive terms of the Act for the union of the two kingdoms, 'to promote and secure the essential interests of Great Britain and Ireland, and to consolidate the strength, power, and resources of the British Empire.'"

Sir G. Hill contended, that if the House should now consent to go into the inquiry proposed by the right hon. baronet, it would kindle the animosities that existed between the two parties in Ireland. He believed that the complete impartiality of the Government, and a little more patience on the part of the people, would have all the beneficial effects which the right hon. baronet expected from his motion, and therefore, he moved, as an amendment, "That the other orders of the day be now read."

Sir N. Colthurst said, he understood that the attention of Government was now directed to the means of finding employment for the working classes in Ireland. He was fully persuaded that any measure of relief for that country must be immediate.

Sir J. Newport replied, and urged the adoption of his motion.

The House divided on the amendment—

Friday, June 20.

SAVINGS BANKS.] On the motion of Lord Dynevor, the Savings Banks Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed for Wednesday.

Friday, June 20.

ALE-HOUSES.] Mr. S. Wortley presented a petition of Barber Beaumont, Esq. which stated, in substance, that he had built several public houses at Stepney and Shepherd's Bush, but that he had not been able to procure a license to open any of them; he therefore prayed, that the bill now before the House for regulating Ale-houses, might not in its present shape pass into a law, and that his property might not continue subjected to the sovereign pleasure of persons whose mal-practices his evidence before the Police Committee had developed.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

TITHES.] Mr. Lockhart brought in his bill "for the amendment of the law in respect to Tithes," which was read a first time.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply.

Sir G. Warrender rose, and proposed that 19,000 men be employed for the sea service for seven lunar months; from the 17th day of June, 1817, including 6,000 Royal marines.

Sir G. Pole thought that persons should not have the same benefit of rising to pensions during peace, as in time of war. The pension list was increasing every year, and therefore, this was one of the items to which he should object.

Sir G. Warrender said, that the small number of men employed in time of peace, could not make any great addition to the pensions for the navy.

Mr. Calcraft was of opinion, that the same prospective regulations should be applied to the navy, as had been recommended in the Report of the Army Estimates. At present, however, they were discussing this question under very great disadvantages: not having the Report of the Committee before them, they did not, in fact, know what they were saying.

Mr. Crabtree observed, that the House might now vote the Supplies; and any objectionable points could be discussed on another occasion.

The Resolution was then agreed to, and the following sums were voted.—253,700*l.* “for wages of the said 19,000 men for seven lunar months, at the rate of 1*l.* 18*s.* per man per month.”—272,650*l.* “for victuals for the said men for seven lunar months, at the rate of 2*l.* 1*s.* per man per month.”—285,950*l.* “for the wear and tear of the ships in which the said men are to serve, for seven lunar months, at the rate of 2*l.* 3*s.* per man per month.”—26,600*l.* “for ordnance for sea service on board the ships in which the said men are to serve, for seven lunar months, at the rate of 4*s.* per man per month.”—1,660,000*l.*, “towards paying off and discharging the debt of the navy and transport service.”—119,026*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* “for the expense of the transport service, for the service of sick and wounded seamen, and for the service relating to prisoners of war, for seven months, commencing the 16th day of June, 1817.”

A Resolution for the sum of 910,885*l.* for extraordinary expenses of the Navy, was withdrawn for the present; and Mr. Tierney observed, that he should object to the sum of 1,000*l.* per annum to the Vice-Admiral of Scotland, the Committee having recommended that that place should be abolished.

IRISH MISCELLANEOUS SERVICES.] Mr. Peel rose to propose certain resolutions for Miscellaneous Services for Ireland. There were, he observed, some additional charges, but for such objects as, he was persuaded, the House would not object to; namely, the Foundling Hospital, and the Society for the education of the poor in Ireland. (Hear.) In the Schools of this society, the children of the poor were instructed in the great principles of religion, without any distinction of opinions, and the governors were composed of persons of all religious denominations. (Hear.) One item of reduction was that of the late Express establishment; by the abolition of which, a saving of 5,000*l.* a year had been effected. The total saving on the estimates was 100,000*l.*; and he could assure the House, that the utmost possible economy had been adopted.

The following sums were then proposed, and agreed to—

ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—7,510*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* sterling, being 7,990*l.* Irish, “for the Richmond Lunatic Asylum at Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—7,752*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.* sterling, being 8,399*l.* Irish, “for the Hibernian Society for soldiers’ children at Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—2,755*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* sterling, being 2,985*l.* Irish, “for the Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—2,769*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* sterling, being 3,000*l.* Irish, “for the Female Orphan House in the Circular Road, Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—8,316*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.* sterling, being 9,010*l.* Irish, “for the Westmorland Lock Hospital in Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—3,148*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* sterling, being 3,411*l.* Irish, “for the Lying-in-Hospital in Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—1,467*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* sterling, being 1,590*l.* Irish, “for Doctor Steevens’s Hospital, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—4,615*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* sterling, being 5,000*l.* Irish, for the House of Recovery and Fever Hospital in Cork Street Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—465*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* sterling, being 504*l.* Irish, “for the Hospital for Incurables at Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—3,490*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* sterling, being 3,716*l.* Irish, “for the Association for discountenancing Vice, and promoting the Knowledge and Practice of the Christian Religion, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—104*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* sterling, being 113*l.* Irish, “for the Green Coat Hospital of the City of Cork, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—8,910*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* sterling, being 9,653*l.* Irish, “for the furtherance of several objects of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—9,230*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* sterling, being 10,000*l.* Irish, “for the Dublin Society, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—9,230*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* sterling, being 10,000*l.* Irish, “for building Churches and Glebe Houses, and purchasing Glebes in Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—18,461*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* sterling, being 20,000*l.* Irish, “to be paid to the Trustees and Commissioners of First Fruits in Ireland, to be by them employed towards the building, rebuilding, and enlarging of Churches and Chapels, the building of Glebe Houses and procuring Glebes in Ireland, in such manner as they shall think fit.”—19,938*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* sterling, being 21,600*l.* Irish, “for defraying the Expense of the Trustees of the Linen and Hempen Manufactures of Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818, to be by the said Trustees applied in such manner as shall appear to them to be most conducive to promote and encourage the said Manufactures.”—11,076*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.* sterling, being 12,000*l.* Irish, “for defraying the Expense of the Commissioners for making wide and convenient Streets in the City of Dublin, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818.”—4,539*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* sterling, being 4,918*l.* Irish,

"for defraying the Expenses of the Farming Society of Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—2,307*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* sterling, being 2,500*l.* Irish, "for the Cork Institution, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—276*l.* 18*s.* 5½*d.* sterling, being 300*l.* Irish, "to defray an additional allowance to the Chairman of the Board of Inland Navigation in Ireland, for 1817."—1,153*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* sterling, being 1,250*l.* Irish, "for the Remuneration of several Public Officers in Ireland, for their extraordinary trouble in 1817."—19,859*l.* 1*s.* 6½*d.* sterling, being 21,514*l.* Irish, "for defraying the Expenditure of the Board of Works in Ireland, for 1817."—20,809*l.* 11*s.* 9½*d.* sterling, being 22,543*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.* Irish, "for Printing, Stationary, and other Disbursements, for the Chief and Under Secretaries Offices and Apartments, and other Public Offices in Dublin Castle, &c.; and for Riding Charges and other Expenses of the Deputy Pursuivants and Extra Messengers attending the said Offices; also Superannuated Allowances in the said Chief Secretary's Office; for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—9,692*l.* 6*s.* 1½*d.* sterling, being, 10,500*l.* Irish, "for publishing Proclamations and other matters of a public nature, in the Dublin Gazette and other Newspapers in Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—3,439*l.* 12*s.* 3½*d.* sterling, being 3,726*l.* 5*s.* Irish, "for Printing 1,290 Copies of a compressed Quarto Edition of the Statutes of the United Kingdom, for the use of the Magistrates of Ireland; and also 250 copies of a Folio Edition of ditto, bound, for the use of the Lords, Bishops, and Public Officers in Ireland."—23,076*l.* 18*s.* 5½*d.* sterling, being 25,000*l.* Irish, "for Criminal Prosecutions, and other Law Expenses in Ireland, from the 5th January, 1817, to the 5th January, 1818."—2,307*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* sterling, being 2,500*l.* Irish, "for apprehending Public Offenders in Ireland, from the 5th Jan. 1817, to the 5th Jan. 1818."—8,581*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* sterling, being 9,297*l.* Irish, "for completing the Sum necessary for the Support of the Non-Conforming Ministers in Ireland, from the 5th Jan. 1817, to the 5th Jan. 1818."—3,794*l.* 15*s.* 4½*d.* sterling, being 4,111*l.* Irish, "for the Support of the Seceding Ministers from the Synod of Ulster in Ireland, for one year, from the 25th March, 1817, to the 25th March, 1818."—1,949*l.* 10*s.* 9½*d.* sterling, being 2,112*l.* Irish, "for paying the Salaries of the Lottery Officers in Ireland, for one year, ending the 24th June, 1817."—939*l.* 0*s.* 9½*d.* sterling, being 1,017*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* Irish, "for defraying the Expense of Pratique of the Port of Dublin, from the 25th Dec. 1815, to the 5th Jan. 1817."—683*l.* 1*s.* 6½*d.* sterling, being 740*l.* Irish, "for defraying the Charge of Clothing the Battle-Axe Guards for eighteen months, commencing from the 1st Dec. 1817."—329*l.* 1*s.* 6½*d.* sterling, being 350*l.* Irish, "for defraying the Sum necessary for the Royal Irish Academy in the City of Dublin, for the year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—10,153*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.*

The Report was ordered for to-morrow, and the Committee to sit again on Monday.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.—[CRIMINAL LAW OF SCOTLAND.] A message from the Lords informed the House, that their lordships had passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to continue an Act to empower his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government;" to which bill they requested the concurrence of the Commons.

Lord Althorpe hoped, that in order to avoid inconvenience and difficulty, the noble lord (Castlereagh) would not propose the first reading of this bill, until the Secret Committee of the House of Commons should have made their Report.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that the House would perhaps allow the bill to be read a first time. (Loud and general cries of no.) He had not intended to propose the second reading until after the Committee should have made their Report, which he understood would be ready to present in the course of the evening. He would not, however, press the first reading at present, but merely give notice that he should move it on Monday.

Mr. Ponsonby was glad that the noble lord had postponed the motion for the first reading, as he, for one, should oppose the bill in every stage. (Hear, hear.)

Sir S. Romilly presented a petition signed by 1,400 merchants, bankers, and other inhabitants of Kingston-upon-Hull, praying that the House would not agree to any further suspension of the Habeas Corpus. The petitioners were, he believed, all persons of the most respectable character and situation. They represented, that in their judgment the existing laws were full adequate to the suppression of any disturbances and they implored the House, at this late period of the session, instead of passing an act which when they were relieved from their duties, would leave their constituents during the recess of Parliament without the benefits of the Constitution, to institute an inquiry into public abuses, to endeavour to diminish the public expenditure, and by such means lessen, if not wholly remove, the public discontent. (Hear, hear.)

On the motion that the petition should lie on the table, .

Lord A. Hamilton rose, and, after having observed that he should be unable to attend in his place next week, begged to avail himself of the present opportunity to say a few words on the subject. He was anxious to express his decided conviction that the measure was as unnecessary in Scotland as it was in this country; and he was persuaded that it had been much abused. In Scotland it had become the means of great persecution. An unfortunate man (Mackinlay) had been apprehended there, confined, dragged before a tribunal, and the proceedings against him then dropped. The same course had been a second time repeated, and a second time the indictment had been withdrawn. The law-officer of the Crown had determined a third time to prosecute this man, and the proceedings were still pending. (Hear, hear.) In addition to all this, he felt himself the more imperiously compelled to speak on the present occasion, on account of the system pursued by Ministers—a system by which the sources of their information proved to be the cause of the very evils of which they complained.

After a short pause, Mr. Brougham rose, and expressed his astonishment that no member of his Majesty's Government, particularly of that part of his Majesty's Government which was connected with Scotland, had taken any notice of his noble friend's statement. Had the House heard, had the noble lord and the right hon. gentlemen opposite heard, that a man had been put on his trial three times for the same offence? He knew, that by the Scotch law, most unhappily for Scotland, a party might be tried a thousand times for the same offence, if the law-officers of the Crown thought it advisable; for although no man could be brought before a jury more than once, he might be made to suffer all the suspense and anxiety attendant on a state of trial, as often as it might be deemed expedient to subject him to the infliction. The House had been informed, that the first indictment against this unfortunate man, charged with high treason, had been quashed by the Court; there had been one trial, one detention in prison, one solitary confinement, one period of painful suspense; then came a second charge, a second imprisonment, and a second period of suspense, a second judgment, and a second indictment quashed. The Crown officers, not satisfied with this, were now preparing a third torture for this unfortunate man. It was impossible to say what would now be the decision of the Court, but no lawyer who read the indictment could have any doubt as to its inefficacy. If the prosecutors failed on this occasion, would they commence a fourth time? For his own part, he must believe that such was the intention, since no explanation had been given on this subject by the other side of the House. (Hear, hear.)

Sir S. Romilly wished to ask a question of the opposite Bench. He had been informed, and on credible, although perhaps not on the highest authority, that the man, of whom his noble and his hon. and learned friend had spoken, though tried for felony, had three several times been committed by the Lord Advocate on a warrant for high treason, merely that he might be confined in a particular prison. What he wished to know was, whether this had actually been done by the Lord Advocate?

The Attorney-General replied, that he had not the slightest knowledge of the facts that had been stated, but he did not think that the Lord Advocate would be guilty of an irregularity. How the three trials might stand by the law of Scotland he did not know; but he thought that, if the law were so, there were many cases in which it might be enforced without oppression. In England, when a man was indicted and acquitted, he could not be tried again for the same offence; but there were many cases in which, by the law of England, a person discharged on one indictment might be tried for the very same facts under a different denomination. This might have been the case in Scotland, and therefore he deprecated this partial statement of the question, which was not connected with the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and might have happened equally whether that act were suspended or no.

Mr. Brougham explained, and admitted that the course pursued was consistent with the strict law of Scotland; but there was nothing in that law which made a lawyer unable to draw an indictment, or which was peremptory on him to try one person three or four times.

Mr. W. Dundas observed, that the explanation just given by the hon. and learned gentleman almost rendered any further observation superfluous. He would, however, trouble the House with a single word on the subject. The noble lord having first stated that he should be unable to attend the discussion next week on the bill for the continuance of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, which would otherwise meet with his opposition, had coupled that statement with another which had no reference or connection with it—of some occurrences at trial in Scotland. He (Mr. D.) was persuaded, and in that persuasion he was fortified by what had just fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman, that whatever had taken place at that trial, might have occurred although the Habeas Corpus had not been suspended, and that it was in strict conformity with the law of Scotland. Unless, therefore, Parliament were called upon to alter the law, he could see no reason for asking why any proceeding had taken place.

Sir J. Newport felt that there was an intimate connexion between the sentiments of his noble friend on the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and the circumstances of the trial which had been described. When the House were to be called on to continue an enlargement of the powers of the Crown, it was material that they should know how the powers had been used which had already been conferred.

Mr. W. Dundas said, his argument was, that the power on which the occurrences described in the trial were founded, existed in the law of Scotland, independently of any suspension of the Habeas Corpus.

Lord A. Hamilton in explanation, disclaimed having asserted that any thing had been done contrary to the law of Scotland. But the spirit of the proceeding was manifested by the notorious fact, establishing a substantive connexion between the circumstances of the trial and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, that subsequently to the quashing of the first indictment, the individual in question was imprisoned, in the same manner as every person who was accused of sedition or treason, instead of being allowed the access of his friends and acquaintance, and those common comforts which were calculated to soften the rigours of confinement. (Cries of spoke.)

Mr. Abercromby said, that when the House considered what the circumstance was—namely, that an individual had been indicted three times for the same offence, it seemed more natural that some person should call their attention to the subject, than that Ministers should not consider it within the scope of their duty to explain circumstances so unusual and so revolting to every proper feeling. Their silence created a suspicion as to the nature and accuracy of the information which they had received from Scotland. Every one must remember the impression made by the Lord Advocate, on his reading a certain oath in that House. (see page 352.) It had induced many to vote for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. (Hear, hear.) It now appeared, however, that the learned lord was obliged to make three attempts to convict a person whom he had charged with seditious practices. All this required explanation. He was exceedingly astonished that none of his Majesty's Ministers had had their attention excited towards this subject, and were able to explain it. In another point of view the circumstances mentioned by his noble friend had an intimate connexion with the approaching discussion. It shewed what the powers and disposition of the Lord Advocate were, and would help the House to appreciate the character of the Ministers to whom they were required to give such extraordinary authority. It proved that they were not entitled to any such confidence.

Lord Castlereagh was willing to admit, that if there had been any impropriety in the proceeding alluded to, it might be a fit subject to which at some future period to call the attention of Parliament: but nothing could be so little productive of public utility as that collateral manner of attacking the conduct of a court of law, either in Scotland or in England, and of demanding an explanation which those who asked it must be perfectly aware that Ministers could not at all be prepared to give. (Hear, hear.) If there was any one thing of which the House of Commons ought to be jealous, it was of any interference on the part of Ministers with courts of law; and of any assumed responsibility on their part for the exercise, in the first instance, of the discretion of those who, happily for the subject, were influenced by legal, and not by political motives; and who were themselves eventually responsible for their conduct to Parliament and the country. He maintained that these interlocutory discussions were only introduced for the purpose of interrupting the business of the nation, (loud and vehement cries from the Opposition,) and for the purpose of making a false impression—(reiterated shouts of hear from the Opposition)—a false impression he would say, (cries of hear repeated,) on the public mind. He considered the question which had been put as coming more from political hostility than from any real complaint against the Scotch judicature. He protested against the whole course of this proceeding; [and was not ashamed to say, that he was unacquainted with what the Lord Advocate was doing 400 miles off. However, he entered no defence for that officer; he had the highest opinion of his skill and integrity, and believed that he would give a sufficient answer to all charges whenever he was arraigned; but he protested against the arraigning him thus in his absence, or introducing the question on a subject with which it was not connected.]

Lord Milton said, this protest against the arraignment of the Lord Advocate, because he was absent and 400 miles off, was the most extraordinary protest he had ever heard of; because, if the argument were good for any thing, it went to shew that law officers at a distance should never be arraigned in that House at all. This arraignment, however, might turn out to be an arraignment of Government; and he confessed he was not a little surprised to hear a member of that Executive Government which ought to cast a superintending eye on all the proceedings of its law officers throughout the empire, abdicating so important a branch of his public functions. (Hear, hear.) He was sure that the hon. and learned gentlemen opposite would be much astonished—and more especially in cases of treason, if they were told that they need not communicate with the Executive Government. He took the opportunity of expressing his hope, that the Report of the Secret Committee would be presented as soon as possible. It must be the wish of all of Ministers themselves—that it should be in the hands of members as long as possible before the approaching discussion of a question of such vital importance.

Lord Castlereagh said, he had no objection to discuss the conduct of the law officers on a specific question, or to give information on any reasonable notice; but he still protested against these incidental discussions.

Mr. Brougham said, the judicature of Scotland had nothing to do with the business. The House were not, perhaps, aware, that all the proceedings in Scotland, which had been alluded to that night, were in the nature of ex officio informations.

Mr. Abercromby rose, but, in consequence of cries of "Spoke," he could not proceed.

Lord Castlereagh said, it was a grievous wrong, that a charge should be brought forward against an individual, without giving him a fair opportunity of defending himself. (Cries of Spoke.)

Mr. Ponsonby rose, but was interrupted by cries of "Chair," and "Spoke."

Mr. Curwen said, he should have agreed with the noble lord that this was not a fair opportunity to put these questions, if it were not for the peculiar circumstances in which the House was placed. Would the noble lord suspend the question of the Habeas Corpus to inquire into the present statement? If so, his complaint was but fair and candid; but if he would not, no opportunity should be lost of putting the House on its guard: to be guilty of omission in such a matter would be treason to the Constitution. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Ponsonby said, he certainly had not delivered his sentiments on this subject; and, however impatient the hon. gentleman (Mr. H. Davis) might be, it would not be in his power to prevent him from speaking, although at the hazard of his displeasure. The noble lord (Lord A. Hamilton), and his hon. and learned friends, had been accused of arraigning, without sufficient cause, the judicature of the country. Now there was nothing farther from the intention of any of them, he was convinced, than to cast any imputation on, or to arraign, the conduct of the Scotch Judges. But the Lord Advocate of Scotland was not the judicature of Scotland—he was not a Court of Justice—he was not a Judge authorized by the law of Scotland to administer justice. He was the prosecuting officer on the part of the Crown. He did not mean now to arraign his conduct, because he did not know the circumstances of the case. But to one who was acquainted with the law of England only, it appeared strange that the same man should be arraigned three times for the same offence. Being ignorant of the circumstances which might have determined the conduct of the Lord Advocate, or which might serve to justify it, he should not pronounce any opinion on the case;

but in England, were the same thing to happen, it would be called an oppressive proceeding. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. H. Davis said, he had not addressed himself to the right hon. gentleman, whom he did not see at the time, but to an hon. gentleman behind him.

Mr. Canning argued, that a charge against the Lord Advocate, coupled with an admission that he had acted according to the Scotch law, was in fact an arraignment of the whole system of Scotch judicature. If what had been done was legal, it was to no purpose to arraign the conduct of the officer concerned; but the proper course would be, to propose a remedy for such a law. Whether the Lord Advocate had gone beyond the discretion vested in him, this was not the time to inquire; and he (Mr. C.) required more light on Scotch law before he could solve such a question: but his noble friend had said, with reason, that the effect of what had been stated was to create an unjust impression against the law officer in question, not for exercising the duties of his office, but as having exercised them improperly. When it had been said, that an individual had been three times imprisoned for the same offence, it was impossible not to wish to live under a different state of laws (hear, hear); but the law of Scotland was so, and the evil could only be remedied by altering that law. If imputations were still held out that the law officer had been guilty of improper conduct, all he asked was, that notice should be given of any charge, in order that the parties might come prepared to answer it. A noble lord opposite had thought it extraordinary that Ministers were not in possession of all the facts, and ready to give accurate information on a practice of law, of which they had no knowledge; he (Mr. C.) differed from him entirely, and thought that Ministers would be guilty of an abuse of their powers, if they interfered in any way with the administration of justice, the purity of which ought to be, as it long had been, above the approaches of all power. He agreed that that House was the proper guardian of courts of judicature; and if any question were brought forward connected with the present subject, he hoped that every member would come to it with an unprejudiced mind: for his own part, he should then be prepared to give an honest opinion.

Lord Milton explained.

Lord Folkestone thought that the hon. gentleman himself had expressly arraigned the judicature of Scotland, in saying that it was impossible not to wish to avoid living under such a law, and that a change in it ought to be made. That in itself was a complete arraignment of the law of Scotland. But the noble lord (Hamilton) and his hon. and learned friends had complained not so much of the law as of the discretion exercised by the Lord Advocate; and they felt dissatisfied at no answer having been given. He now wished to ask about the appearance of the Report of the Secret Committee: he believed that it was ready, but that the chairman (Mr. B. Bathurst) was disinclined to bring it up that evening. If so, he hoped that some hon. gentlemen on the other side, who had interest enough, would obtain the production of it as soon as possible, as it was important that the House should be in possession of the facts.

Mr. Finlay said, he felt disgusted and disappointed, as did the whole Scotch nation, that an individual should be confined to a solitary prison, and tried over and over again, merely because the Lord Advocate was unable to draw an indictment. (Hear, hear, hear.) He complained that the legal affairs of that country were placed in such hands that it was impossible such circumstances should not frequently recur. An indictment had been three times quashed, and might, perhaps, meet with the same fate a fourth time. (Hear, hear.) Was it to be endured that his Majesty's Ministers should allow the law to be in the hands of a person who could not draw an indictment, while the consequence might be, that, after all, the man would escape, whether innocent or guilty? The law of Scotland was right enough in itself—it allowed an indictment to be repeatedly amended in point of form, and before trial; but who ever heard of an indictment being preferred three times for the same offence, after the case had been argued? On these grounds he thought the thanks of hon. gentlemen were due to the noble lord who had brought this subject before the House.

Mr. Fitzgerald said, that he could not concur with the hon. gentleman who spoke last, in thinking that the noble lord who had commenced this discussion deserved the thanks of the House. He thought the noble lord himself, from what had taken place, must regret that he had done so; for in the absence of the learned lord, who thus had not an opportunity of defending himself, charges of incapacity and oppressive practices had been brought forward against him, and without notice, and at a time when a petition from Hull was presented. He had risen on this occasion, actuated merely by the feeling of every honest man, not to suffer an individual to be run down in his absence. (Hear, hear.)

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

ELECTIONS.] Mr. W. Wynn brought up the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the best means of shortening the duration of Polls, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] Lord Folkestone rose and said, he was desirous to have the Report of the Select Committee produced, as they had now terminated their labours. The early production of it would be a great convenience, particularly as it was to be followed up by the important measure of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was extraordinary that any member should keep such a report in his pocket. The person to whom he alluded (Mr. B. Bathurst) was not then in his place, but he hoped the House would find a remedy for his absence. He therefore moved, that Lord Milton, as one of the Committees, have leave to report from the Select Committee.

Lord Castlereagh said, he understood that the Report would be presented in the course of the evening. It was not intended to move any immediate discussion upon it, but to propose that it should be printed. It might be taken into consideration on Monday evening, if the House thought proper. He could see no particular inconvenience from its not being presented at that moment, and he apprehended that the motion would produce no particular advantage. The immediate business of the evening (the Budget) had been already delayed by other matters. It was to be perfectly understood that the Report would be presented that night.

Mr. Ponsonby was glad that the labours of the Committee had been closed. He thought the motion might be amended. He supposed the noble lord's wish was to have the Report read at an early hour, which would certainly be personally convenient to many members. If Mr. B. Bathurst were ordered to attend forthwith, he had no doubt that he would appear. He, therefore, moved as an amendment, "that the Right hon. Charles Bragge Bathurst do forthwith attend this House in his place." (Hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone asked leave to withdraw his motion, which was granted, and Mr. Ponsonby's motion was then put.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer contended, that a member could not be ordered to attend forthwith, but ought to be summoned to appear at a certain time.

Mr. W. Wynn said, there was a precedent for this mode of proceeding. In a case of high words that had passed between two members, who afterwards withdrew, it was ordered that both should attend forthwith, and he was one of two who were dispatched for them.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that it might be proper on a member's immediately leaving the House, but his right hon. friend had left the House some time ago. He should move as an amendment to leave out from the word, "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider further of the Ways and Means for raising a supply to his Majesty, be now read."

Mr. Brougham said, that as a precedent had been cited by his hon. friend, the only difficulty that appeared in the business was, the difficulty of finding Mr. B. Bathurst. The better way would be to select two members who were acquainted with the haunts of the right hon. Chairman of the Committee of Secrecy. (A laugh.)

Lord Milton said, he was desirous that the Report should be read at an early hour, that gentlemen might have more time to consider it.

He was glad his noble friend had withdrawn his motion, as, if it had passed, he should have found great difficulty in complying with it. It was more desirable to have the Report read early than at twelve or one o'clock, after the other business had been gone through, and when there might be few members present, except those who generally attended on the part of Government. He himself was of course acquainted with its contents, and therefore wished others to hear it read with its concluding recommendation. It had appeared to him in the Committee that several members wished to enlarge and magnify the dangers of the country; and to communicate an unnecessary alarm. (Hear.) He thought the Report might be found to contain matter which might have been expressed in more consistency with the evidence produced to the Committee. (Hear.) Also that some things were omitted that might have been mentioned; while others were not stated in a sufficiently impressive manner.

Mr. Gipperose to call the noble lord to order.

Lord Milton resumed. If he thought he should be really out of order in the statement, he was the last man to attempt it. He only wished to express his sentiments early. He thought he saw an intention not to present the Report till the other business of the evening was concluded. He hoped he should not be allowed to proceed, if he were out of order.

The Speaker said that, as far as he could judge, the noble lord had not been disorderly, as he had only been stating why he wished for the Report. The question would be with the House to determine.

Lord Milton proceeded.—It struck him, that with respect to the dangers which threatened the country, there were many other circumstances which ought to have been taken into consideration besides those stated in the Report. There were many gentlemen in the Committee who thought that revolution and the destruction of social order were to be apprehended. To him it appeared that the danger was of a very different nature, as were the causes which led to it. The House would recollect that about five years ago a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into what was called Luddism. In the Secret Committee he saw that system enlarged and more dangerous, acquiring certainly some new features, but still essentially the same. It was still Luddism which they had now to complain of. The House would recollect that a different course had formerly been adopted. They passed local measures, with reference only to those parts in which the outrages existed. The course then adopted proved to be a wise one, and the remedy then applied was well adapted to the cure of the evil.—He did not mean to say that the evil was completely eradicated; but the measures adopted had the effect of subduing it for the time, and of bringing the disturbed counties into a more civilised and comfortable state. And therefore it appeared to him inconclusive, when they had so striking a resemblance now to the circumstances of the former period, that they did not now propose—he did not say the same measures exactly—but measures analogous with respect to local operation. (Hear, hear.) The Committee had differed with him on this point (hear, hear, hear!); because, in the opinion of the gentlemen to whom he had alluded, the danger of the country was of a more extensive kind, and required more general and severe remedies.

Here the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, and, alluding to the approach of Mr. B. Bathurst, begged to withdraw his amendment.—Mr. Ponsonby also withdrew his motion.

Mr. B. Bathurst then entered the House with the Report. (Hear, and laughter.)—He brought it up, and moved that it be read, and it was read, as follows:—

The Committee of Secrecy, to whom the several Papers which were presented (sealed up) to the House, by Lord Viscount Castlereagh, on the 5th day of this instant June, by command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, were referred, and who were directed to examine the matters thereof, and report the same, as they should appear to them, to the House, have, pursuant to the order of the House, examined the same accordingly, and agreed to the following Report:

In forming an opinion on the present internal situation of the country, your Committee could not fail to bear in mind the information laid before them at an early part of the session, upon which their first Report was founded.

The papers now communicated to the Committee continue the narrative of the proceedings of the disaffected in the counties before referred to, viz. Lancashire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire, (to which part of Yorkshire and the towns of Birmingham and Stockport must now be added) from the period of that Report down to the present time.

Your Committee find in these papers not only a complete corroboration of the justness of the apprehensions which they then expressed, but proofs equally decisive of the continuance of the same machinations and designs, breaking out into fresh acts of violence and insurrection, up to the present moment.

Your Committee stated in their former Report, that “even where petitioning was recommended, it was proposed to be conducted in such a manner, by an immense number of delegates, attending in London at the same time, in several parties, attached to each petition, as might induce an effort to obtain by force whatever they demanded; and that a general idea seemed prevalent that some fixed day, at no very great distance, was to be appointed for a general rising.”

The first attention of your Committee has been directed to the proceedings of the public meeting held early in March, in the town of Manchester. At that meeting, which consisted of persons assembled from various towns and populous villages in the vicinity of Manchester, as well as of inhabitants of Manchester itself, it was proposed by the same leaders who had previously attracted the notice of your Committee, that the petitioners should assemble at the same place, on Monday, the 10th of that month, prepared to set out on a march to London to present their petition themselves to the Prince Regent in person; that they should form themselves into parties of ten each (which arrangement was proposed with the professed view of not transgressing the law); and that they should supply themselves with provisions for the march, and with blankets for the purpose of sleeping on the ground.

At many other meetings previous to the 10th, which, though comparatively private, were yet numerous attended, it was represented to them, by their orators, that they would be surrounded by the police and the military, and that they would be an easy prey if they proceeded without arms for their protection. They were assured, however, that their numbers, which in the course of their progress would amount to not less than 100,000, would make it impossible ultimately to resist them. It was stated, that all the large towns in Yorkshire were adopting the same plan, that the Scotch were actually on their march, and that if the petitioners could once reach Nottingham, or Birmingham, the business would be done. They were advised to choose leaders over each subdivision of tens, fifties, and hundreds, and to appoint a treasurer to receive contributions, which were actually made in a great number of small sums; out of which fund they were taught to expect that each man would be supplied with a daily allowance.

A petition was accordingly prepared, with a copy of which every tenth man was furnished; and which concluded by stating to his Royal Highness, that, without the change which they demanded, "they could neither support him, nor themselves;" and they were told, that if their petition was rejected, they must demand it; if still rejected, they must force it, and say they would be righted. It appears that some of the persons apprehended were fully prepared to act up to these instructions; though it is to be presumed that many of them had no very definite idea of the way in which their services were to be employed; and that even among their leaders some of the more moderate reckoned rather upon intimidation than upon the actual employment of force. At one of those more private meetings, however, which preceded the general assembly, one of those persons who appeared to have most influence avowed himself a republican and leveler; and professed his determination never to give up till they had established a republican government; the examples of the insurrection in the reign of Richard II., and of the rebellion in Ireland in 1798, were held out, as objects of imitation; and the most violent of such declarations was generally received with the strongest marks of applause.

In consequence of these preparations, the public meeting proposed took place at the time appointed; and was attended by probably near 12,000 persons: many of these proceeded to the ground in regular order, with knapsacks on their backs, and notwithstanding the assembly was dispersed by the military, acting under the orders of the magistrates, and the principal leaders were apprehended under warrants from the Secretary of State, a considerable number actually marched off on their way to London; many were intercepted before they reached Stockport, but several found their way as far as Ashbourn.

The act for enabling his Majesty to detain suspected persons had now passed: most of those who had rendered themselves most conspicuous in exciting disaffection in this part of the country had either been apprehended, or had secreted themselves; and all hopes were precluded of any immediate result from the assemblage which had been so long concerted: yet it appears to your Committee, from a variety of concurrent testimony, on which they rely, that the previous organization had been extended so widely, and the expectation of ultimate success had been so confidently entertained, that these circumstances produced no other effect on the great body of the discontented than to delay the explosion which had so long been meditated; to occasion the discontinuance of the more open meetings of the association, and to call forth the exertions of new leaders, who were determined (in their own phrase) "to reorganize the party." Meetings were accordingly held in several of the townships in the neighbourhood of Manchester between the 10th and 25th of March, with more privacy, but under the established system of delegation; at which only the deputies from the disaffected places were present; and at which it was resolved to promote a general rising at Manchester on Sunday, the 30th of March, or the following day. A meeting was appointed for the leaders at Ardwick-bridge, close to Manchester, on the Friday before that day, where they expected to receive information from Birmingham, Sheffield, and other places, with which they were in communication; having previously learnt from an emissary, who had visited Huddersfield and Leeds, that the disaffected in that part of the country were all ready to begin at any time, and were preparing arms for the purpose. The design was to assemble as many as could be collected, in the night, at Manchester; to attack the barracks, the police-office, the prison, the houses of magistrates and constables, and the banks, in separate parties, and to set fire to the factories in the town. It was even declared by one of the conspirators, that this last atrocity was intended for the purpose of increasing the prevalent distress, in the hope of thereby adding to the numbers of the discontented, by throwing the workmen out of employment. It was calculated that 2 or 3,000 men would be enough to commence these operations, as they reckoned upon being joined by 50,000 at the dawn of day. A proclamation was said to be prepared in order to be produced on this occasion, justifying the revolt, and absolving the insurgents from their allegiance. Expectations were held out, that a general insurrection would take place at the same time in different parts of the counties of Lancaster, York, Warwick, Leicester, Nottingham, Chester, and Stafford; and though some of these, particularly the two latter counties, may have been included without any sufficient ground, your Committee see just reason to apprehend, that a successful insurrection at Manchester would have been followed by partial risings, to an alarming amount, in each of the other counties. Some preparations were made for providing ammunition, with a view to the arms which it was intended to seize. The execution of this plan was defeated by the vigilance of the magistrates, who, being apprized of what was in agitation, made a communication to the Secretary of State, by whom warrants were immediately issued, and the ringleaders assembled at Ardwick-bridge were consequently seized on the 28th. The magistrates of Manchester thereupon published an address to the inhabitants, announcing the danger, and calling upon the householders to be sworn as special constables, and to assist in preserving the peace of the town. This plan of the disaffected being thus discovered and deranged, they became more wary and secret in their proceedings; but, in the moment of disappointment, declarations were made, that it would be impossible to prevent the rising for a month longer. The assassination of persons most obnoxious to their resentment was suggested by some of the most desperate of the conspirators; an attack was made upon the house of one of the magistrates; the life of another was threatened; and a pistol was fired into the house of a gentleman who was acting as a special constable. Shortly after this period, it appears to have been discussed, whether it would not be more prudent to discontinue the appointment of delegates, and to rely only upon one man in each town, who might call the disaffected together a short time before the intended insurrection, and seize on horses, preparatory to the attack on Manchester. But, notwithstanding this proposition, the same system of connected operation by means of delegates was indefatigably persevered in.

Delegates from Manchester, Birmingham, Nottingham, Derby, Leeds, Sheffield, Wakefield, Huddersfield, and other places in the disturbed part of the country, either constantly or occasionally attended these meetings. The numbers assembled were not large, but the activity was unceasing; emissaries were continually passing from one of those places to another, to compare their accounts of the state of the public mind; to foment the irritation among the disaffected; and to combine some general plan of simultaneous or connected insurrection; the object of which was, after consolidating a sufficient force, to march upon London, and there to overturn the existing Government, and to establish a republic. The same designs were continued of attacking the barracks, and depots, in different parts of the country (one of which was particularly reconnoitred with that view); of plundering the houses of noblemen and gentlemen, where arms were supposed to be lodged; of seizing the magistrates, and keeping them as hostages, and as authorities for levying contributions on the country, of disarming the soldiers by night, in their quarters, or seducing them from their duty; and of providing arms for themselves, partly by these seizures, and partly by an easy method of forming pike-heads out of common tools and utensils.

It appears to your Committee, that the utmost confidence prevailed among the delegates as to the ultimate attainment of their objects; that the successive arrests of several of the principal leaders, though they occasioned momentary disappointment, did not extinguish the spirit of insurrection, or the hopes of success, in the parts of the country above-mentioned; and the utmost impatience was manifested at the delays which had taken place in fixing the day for the general rising. This after several postponements, was appointed for the Monday in Whitsun week, and was afterwards again postponed to the 9th of June, which was thought more favourable for a midnight insurrection, as the moon would then be in the wane. Notice of this last appointment had been so widely circulated, that it became almost of public notoriety; which, while it awakened the attention of those whose duty it was to preserve the public peace, did not appear to derange the preparations of those who were disposed to disturb it. Even where the planners of the insurrection suggested a farther delay, they found it impossible to restrain the impatience which they had excited among their followers, who had forsaken their ordinary habits of industry, and who must either proceed to the immediate attainment of their object, or for the present relinquish it, and return to their accustomed occupations. On the 28th of May, a meeting of delegates in the neighbourhood of Sheffield was dispersed, and some of the parties were apprehended; and on the 6th of June several persons, described to be delegates (and believed by your Committee to be such), who were assembled at another place in the same neighbourhood, were apprehended by the magistrates of the Riding, assisted by the military, and the final arrangement of the plan, which was there to be settled, was thus happily frustrated. It was confidently expected, that these arrests would disconcert whatever meatures were in preparation, and they appear to have had that effect in the immediate vicinity of Sheffield; but the spirit which had been excited could not be wholly suppressed. In the neighbourhood of Huddersfield, in the night of the 8th instant, several houses were forcibly entered and plundered of arms. A considerable body of armed men were approaching the town, when a small patrol of yeomanry cavalry, attended by a peace-officer, fell in with them, and was received with the discharge of several shot, by which one of their troop-horses was wounded. The patrol having ascertained that they were too few to oppose such numbers, thought it prudent to retreat, when several shots were fired after them without effect. On returning with an additional force to the spot, they found that the whole of the insurgents had disappeared: but guns fired as signals, in different directions, and lights shewn on the heights throughout the country, sufficiently proved the extent of the confederacy, and the concert with which it was organized. In some populous villages of Derbyshire a more open insurrection took place on the 9th of June. A delegate from this part of the country had attended a previous meeting at Nottingham, and an active emissary from thence had joined them in the course of the night. The insurrection began, according to the general plan proposed, with attacks upon houses for the purpose of procuring arms, in one of which a servant was wantonly shot; about 200 insurgents were soon assembled, mostly armed either with pikes or with fire-arms, and began their march towards Nottingham, in expectation of increasing their numbers as they went, and of finding that place in full insurrection and prepared to support them. They were, however, intercepted by detachments of cavalry (under the orders of active and intelligent magistrates) which came up with them in different directions, and totally dispersed them. Between 50 and 60 were taken, and lodged in the different gaols: many fire-arms and pikes were taken at the same time, and a quantity of ammunition was found upon the persons of the prisoners.

Your Committee have thus stated the prominent points of the information, which has been laid before them, particularly as affecting the manufacturing districts in the northern and midland counties, and which has been substantiated, in almost every particular, by depositions on oath, taken before magistrates. The character of the danger remains the same as was described in the former Report. It arises from the indefatigable exertions of persons in the lower ranks of life, or but little above them, of some popular talents, inflaming and aggravating the actual distress of a numerous manufacturing population, by exciting hopes of an immediate remedy to all their sufferings from a Reform in Parliament, and preparing them (in despair of attaining that object) to attempt, by force, the total subversion of the established Constitution of Government.

Your Committee stated, in their former Report, that the mode of organization, practised with such mischievous success in the populous districts, had been in very many instances conducted under the cover of associations, called Hampden Clubs, formed for the ostensible purpose of procuring a Reform in Parliament: and they now find that in many instances, where the open meetings of those societies have been discontinued, several of the members of them have assembled more privately, and been the principal leaders in the projected combinations.

In their former Report they did not think it necessary to advert to that atrocious system of combination, outrage, and hired assassination, which has prevailed in some of the midland counties, under the name of Luddism; both because the trials of persons charged with those crimes were then known to be depending, and because the system itself did not then distinctly appear to your Committee to have any immediate application to political purposes. But they have since found reason to believe, that those who are concerned in instigating the people to insurrection, have availed themselves of this powerful engine for the more extended purposes of political innovation.

Upon the whole, your Committee have been anxious neither to exaggerate nor extenuate the nature and extent of the danger. They have not been insensible to the jealousy with which the testimony of persons, originally implicated in the designs of the conspirators, or even of persons who, never having engaged in those designs, have attended their meetings, in order to discover and report their proceedings, ought to be received; but the facts stated by your Committee rest not only upon confirmatory evidence, but on distinct, substantive, and satisfactory testimony; and although your Committee have seen reason to apprehend that the language and conduct of some persons from whom information has been derived may in some instances have had the effect of encouraging those designs which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting; yet it is perfectly clear to your Committee, that before any such encouragement could have been given, the plan of a simultaneous insurrection in different parts of the country had been actually concerted, and its execution fully determined on.

Your Committee have the satisfaction to continue to believe, as they have before stated, that the danger which they have described is to be found only among the lower order of the manufacturing population, in particular parts of the country, many of whom are labouring under considerable privations from the low rate of wages and the increasing price of the necessaries of life: though your Committee cannot but remark that the most active and determined insurgents are in many instances to be found among those whose earnings, even in the present state of the manufactures, would enable them to support their families in comfort. They find that of the promoters of these commotions many have either left the country, or are prevented from prosecuting their designs. The disaffected appear to want leaders to conduct such enterprises as they have conceived: are frequently disconcerted by jealousy and distrust of each other, and by the consciousness that their plans are watched; and by the arrests of the ringleaders. Great as the numbers probably are among whom disaffection, to an alarming extent, has made considerable progress, fomented at first by popular harangues, and still by the more powerful and general excitement of seditious publications, your Committee are fully aware, that the number of those who are now prepared to take the lead in any project of open insurrection is not to be estimated by the exaggerated reports of their delegates. Though they have been all along taught to look to London for countenance and support, though some of their own immediate emissaries have, from time to time, affected to bring them hopes of encouragement from that quarter, in case of success; and though it has been stated to your Committee, that a delegate from the country has recently been attending a meeting of delegates in London; no specific information has been laid before your Committee of the existence of any body of men, associated in the metropolis, with whom the disaffected in the country appear to be acting in concert, or to hold communication. Their hopes arise from their own numbers, which, if they could be excited to simultaneous movement, would distract their opponents, and would procure the means for carrying their utmost designs into execution. It is hoped by them, that the timid and irresolute would thus be encouraged to stand forward; and they flatter themselves, that efficient leaders would not be wanting to put themselves at the head of a successful insurrection.

Your Committee cannot contemplate what has passed in the country, ever since the date of their former Report, without the most serious apprehension. During this period the precautionary measures adopted by Parliament have been in force; many of the most active promoters of public disturbance have been apprehended; the immediate projects of the disaffected have been discovered and deranged; yet nothing has deterred them from a steady pursuit of their ultimate object. Though hitherto checked, the least advance towards the attainment of that object could not but be attended with the utmost hazard to the lives and properties of his Majesty's subjects.

In the late insurrection on the borders of Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, the mass of the population through which the insurgents passed evinced the utmost abhorrence of their designs and projects. In other instances, where the inhabitants have been called upon to aid the civil power, that call has been answered with alacrity and zeal. Such conduct increases the claim of the peaceable and loyal inhabitants of the disturbed parts of the country to the most efficient protection.

Your Committee find that it is the concurrent opinion of many of those intrusted with the preservation of the peace, and best acquainted with the state of the disturbed districts, as well as the admission of the disaffected themselves, that the suppression of the attempts at insurrection hitherto made, may, in a great degree, be ascribed to the existence of the extraordinary powers intrusted by Parliament to the Executive Government, even in cases where it has not been found necessary to call them into action; and that the tranquillity of the country would be put to hazard if those powers were now withdrawn. In this opinion your Committee fully concur; and confidently as they rely on the loyalty and good disposition of the great body of his Majesty's subjects, (even in those parts of the country in which the spirit of disaffection has shewn itself in the most formidable shape) they cannot but express their conviction that it is not yet safe to rely entirely, for the preservation of the public tranquillity, upon the ordinary powers of the law.—June 20, 1817."

Mr. B. Bathurst then moved, that the Report do lie on the table and be printed.

Lord Milton rose. He observed, that as the House had now heard the Report read, they would see what was the extent of the danger. It appeared to him, that the Report, in some respects, was so drawn up, as to give too much the appearance of having been wholly agreed to by all the Committee. He had not given his assent to the general complexion and effect which it was calculated to produce upon the country. He thought it stated many circumstances too strongly as to Manchester. He doubted not that many of the leaders were very mischievous and revolutionary; but a meeting of even 12,000—for that was the outside of the numbers stated—at Manchester and Salford, which contained a population of 100,000, surrounded by a populous neighbourhood, could not be called a very general meeting of the people of that part of the country. (Hear.) Too much importance was given to the proceedings. It had been said that the people marched in files to the meeting at Manchester, as if they were all drilled and disciplined; but that was not the case; after all, only about fifty of them went to Ashbourne. Several hundreds, it was said, passed through Leeds; but he knew no evidence of that. The poor deluded manufacturers had been suffering under the severest distress that was ever perhaps known in this country. (Hear.) He could not exactly make out insurrection and treason in the idea of coming in a body to petition the Throne. Some gentlemen, more acute than himself, might discover it; but he conceived they must have a greater share of understanding than most other members of the House.

As to the evidence, he could not exactly describe it in the well known line of Martial :—

Sunt bona, sunt quadam mediocria, sunt mala plura—

It was rather the reverse—much of it was good; some was indifferent, and a part of it very questionable. The majority of the Committee seemed unwilling to put down in the Report those facts and observations which had a tendency to allay the alarms of the country. (Hear, hear.) He was convinced that, in being themselves actuated by these alarms, and in believing their causes to be well founded, they were as sincere as he was in entertaining a contrary opinion, and in refusing a participation in their feelings. They lived in populous districts, where tumults were most apt to occur, and where the numbers of the discontented were greatest; and where, consequently, any agitation was most dangerous. He himself lived in a similar district; and, moreover, his house was said to be one of those pointed out for attack: but, from allowing himself coolly to canvass the evidence on which these reports of insurrections and plots rested, he did not feel much moved. There was another circumstance which he thought it his duty to mention:—the utmost anxiety had been displayed in the Committee to counteract the effect of a paragraph in the Report of the Lords' Committee. He could assure the House, that neither the Committee of that or of the other House had stated so strongly as they ought to have done, the effect which had been produced by the persons employed by Government. And, in his impression on this subject, those who had been called by an Hon. Baronet, the Alarmists, κατ' ἐξῆν, concurred. Those persons, if they saw any danger to the Constitution, would be the first to sound it. Many of the most active Magistrates of the West Riding of Yorkshire were also of opinion, that in that county, as well as in Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, the emissaries of Government had done incalculable mischief. When he expressed this conviction, he did not mean to insinuate that Ministers were aware of what their agents were doing under colour of their authority; far less that they recommended to them such a course of conduct, or approved of their transactions—he merely wished to state a fact. A delegate from London lately arrived at Sheffield in the pay of Government. His approach was expected by the majority of the respectable magistrates with alarm, and by the deluded people, who were not disposed to suspect the trick that was played upon them, with exultation. What purpose could this serve but to agitate the public mind? This system of employing spies under the mask of delegates or agitators was not confined to Sheffield. Another instance had lately been read from a country newspaper, and brought before the public in a manner of which he could not approve. He should have paid little regard to that extract or statement had its truth not been confirmed by other evidence. The truth of the report in the newspaper had, however, been established beyond dispute, by testimony taken before the magistrates of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and before the Lord Lieutenant of the county. (Hear, hear.) He considered it his duty further to mention, that, in his opinion, the Committee in their Report had not paid sufficient attention to the system of Luddism. The Luddites were a peculiar kind of banditti, who lived by plunder; and sought arms as the means of attack or defence. This circumstance, had it been taken into the account, might have explained and accounted for the continued demand for arms in the disturbed districts, without leading to the inference that they were to be used for rebellious purposes against the Government. He was not disposed to undervalue the dangers with which the country was threatened; but when he saw them exaggerated beyond their proper dimensions, he could not lend himself to give them credit himself, or to allow others to be unnecessarily alarmed. These dangers, he was convinced, though great, might have been removed, or at least reduced, had Government taken a different course from that in which they had proceeded. He himself had proposed in the Committee, as the means of preserving the tranquillity of the country, that the agitators, many of whom had been arrested, should be brought to speedy justice, and suffer a punishment adequate to their offences. He believed that he made a specific proposition to that effect in the Committee, an allusion to which, if he remembered right, was made in the Report. (No, no, from the Ministerial benches.) He was certain that he had suggested this proposition, though he did not press it, whether any record of it existed in the labours of the Committee or not. He was then convinced, and he remained so still, that the execution of speedy justice on delinquents, according to the ordinary laws, would have more effect than the exertion of the extraordinary powers demanded by Ministers. A circumstance which convinced him that many of those evils and disturbances for which a remedy was now sought, arose from the artifices and intrigues of emissaries of the Government, was the following: Nottingham, when any insurrectionary movements were spoken of, was always considered the head-quarters of disaffection, and was regarded as being actuated generally with a bad spirit. What he had to state would seem to justify that description; for at Nottingham the spies of Government had produced no impression. The people there, to whom they addressed themselves, from being better acquainted with the principles which they intended to embrace, suspected their sincerity, admitted them to no confidence, and yielded to none of their suggestions; they did not, consequently, take up arms: while in Derbyshire, where the people were more credulous and less suspicious, they produced all the disturbances they desired. When he spoke thus of the proceedings of agents employed by Government, he did not mean to assert that they were the original framers of the conspiracy described in the Report, or that a general rising was not resolved upon before they were sent to the disturbed districts. He would, however, go the length of stating his belief, that but for those emissaries the design might never have been attempted to be carried into execution. (Hear, hear, hear.) A plot was formed, but it might never have exploded. Great jealousies existed among the leaders—they were each envious of the other's influence and power. The funds of the association in particular, though small in themselves, were a tempting bait to those needy adventurers; and would have furnished, in any contest which a robbery of them would have given rise to, a certain cause of dishonour. He had heard much of the organization of this conspiracy, and of the evidence of it supplied in the system of signals, by means of the firing of rockets from different elevated points at proper distances; but he never could be made to understand, nor did he ever hear it properly explained, how these rockets could answer any purpose whatever. He believed, therefore, that the story of their being fired on hills at the distances of ten miles from each other, so as to convey intelligence from one body of rebels to another, was a mere humbug to deceive the credulous; or that, if they were discharged at all, it was to ridicule the fears of the alarmists. He thought it strange, if they were intended for any purpose by the disaffected, that that purpose should not be known, especially as the practice of firing rockets in the manner described had continued for five years, and was said to have been used as a signal in the disturbances of 1812. The organization of the disaffected was said, likewise, to be proved by the system of sending delegates between one district and another. Though there might have been a system of delegation, yet he was convinced that no extensive conspiracy was organized, by which the whole population might be excited, and brought to act against the Laws and the Constitution of the country. In this opinion he was supported by the authority of the commander of the district, who dreaded no insurrection; and thought that the people were not generally disposed to abet the designs of a few mad or misled individuals.—The noble lord said, he had now stated all the observations which it occurred to him to make in this stage of the proceeding. He would appeal to the members of the committee, and would call upon them to say if he had stated any thing incorrectly; if he had disclosed any thing improperly; or, if in describing the difference of opinion that prevailed between him and the majority of the gentlemen with whom he acted, he had deviated from that line of conduct which they might have anticipated from the opinions he uniformly expressed. He allowed that there was cause for alarm; that there was every reason for the utmost vigilance of Government; and that the circumstances of the country called for diligent and active exertions from the magistrates. Nay, he would even go farther, and say, that some new measures might be necessary; but he would always protest against the one which was in contemplation. (Hear, hear.) He did not believe that, in speaking as he had done, he had transgressed the limits of his duty, and he appealed to the members of the committee for the truth of what he had stated.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, he was very much surprised at the course which the noble lord had pursued. He was astonished to hear him now take exceptions to a Report in every part of which he appeared fully to concur, except the practical result at the conclusion. He appealed to every member of the committee, if, even so late as yesterday, there was any expression of dissent from the noble lord. (Hear, hear.) He did not remember that ever the noble lord had made a specific proposition like that which he had just stated. If he had done so, he should have thought it his duty, as chairman, to have attended to it, and perhaps might have procured its adoption by the committee; or, at least, have induced them to come to an amicable understanding upon the subject. He remembered that the language of particular parts of the Report was often changed so as to meet with the general concurrence of members; and that no member was required to sacrifice his individual opinion to that of the majority. Up to the conclusion there seemed to be no difference of opinion on the dangers of the country; the nature of the remedy was the only cause of difference: and on this point, as no unanimity could be expected, every member of the committee reserved his own individual judgment. Being appealed to by the noble lord, he could explicitly state, that he remembered nothing of his making a proposition which was rejected; and that he thought the belief of the dangers of the country, expressed in the Report, was common to the noble lord with every member of the committee. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Milton, in explanation, repeated what he had said, that the general colouring of the Report, when viewed as a whole, conveyed an impression of danger that was very much exaggerated. He allowed that concessions had been made on both sides, but the fact of those concessions proved that a difference of opinion existed. The information which he had that day received had also produced some effect on his mind.

Lord Lascelles said, he had heard the speech of the noble lord with some surprise, and he would even add, regret. (Hear.) As a member of the committee he would say, that when they broke up that morning, neither he, nor any other member with whom he had conversed, had the most distant idea that the noble lord disagreed with any part of the Report. He had heard in debate, that men might blind themselves to alarms, and that the noble lord was not so much alarmed as the rest of the committee. The noble lord had it in his power to have conveyed that impression, and to have stated his difference of opinion. He himself (Lord L.) like every other member of the committee, had assisted in drawing up the Report by suggesting such changes, additions, or omissions, as he thought necessary, to accommodate it to the impression which he received from the evidence. He understood, therefore, that at the conclusion of their work there was not a single difference unadjusted, except the practical recommendation that grew out of the facts and observations in which all concurred. If any difference of opinion arose, it was debated in no spirit of acrimony, and with no obstinacy of opposition; but recourse was immediately had to the evidence, the members weighed with each other its force, and coming to a general understanding, qualified the observation or phraseology so as to meet the views of all. The delay of the Report was occasioned by this desire of accuracy, and this conscientious regard to the rights of individual judgment. Even so late as that morning, doubts arose regarding the force of some statement, and recourse was again had to the evidence to prove its accuracy. He stated this, because it might have been supposed, from the turn which the debate had taken, that every thing was discussed in the spirit of party hostility; that there was an attempt, on the one hand, to exaggerate every alarm, and, on the other, a disposition to believe in no danger; and that a compromise had thus been made up of conflicting opinions, to which the noble lord was not a party. He was surprised that the noble lord should have made such a speech, after he had assented to every part of the Report that described the dangers of the country, and only reserved his opinion of the manner in which that danger should be met. He (Lord L.) believed, that nothing short of this measure could repress the efforts of agitators; but others had a different opinion with regard to the remedy. The danger, however, was unanimously allowed to exist. Had the noble lord made any objection to the Report, or suggested any improvement, there was no doubt that his objection would have been attended to, and his suggestion probably adopted. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Ponsenby said, he felt considerable difficulty on the present occasion; but the noble lord having appealed to the Committee, it was necessary to say a few words. At the same time, he should say as little as possible, and endeavour to be as circumspect as possible. It was perfectly true that his noble friend did not make any specific proposition in the committee, but he certainly stated generally, that though he did not object to any particular part of the Report, yet he considered the whole as calculated to make an impression which the evidence did not justify. He (Mr. P.) would further observe, that the Report did not, perhaps, contain all that could be said upon the subject, and it was understood that whatever particular opinions the members of the committee might entertain with regard to the practical conclusions drawn from it, they would be at perfect liberty to state them in the House. With respect to the points upon which an appeal had been made, in the first place, the House should recollect, that the committee in no instance affirmed any thing of their own knowledge. They stated only such matters as they were enabled to state, according to the evidence laid before them. No member, indeed, except perhaps those who from their official situation might be supposed to have particular intelligence upon certain points, could know any thing beyond what they derived from the evidence. There was a palpable difference, therefore, and which the House ought to bear in its recollection, between an affirmation on the part of the committee, arising from their own knowledge, and that opinion which they formed from the evidence submitted to them. The course of proceeding in the committee was this: at first, its progress was slow; they conversed on and discussed the evidence with great deliberation. When they came to that part of the Report which referred to a remedy for acknowledged danger, there were two opinions; some thought one way, and some another. He then considered it his duty to request that no gentleman of the committee should, on this point, compromise his own opinion, or leave it to be affected for the sake of concurring in the Report. Seeing, after this, that there was no hope of coming to any agreement, he had not attended the committee either on that day or on the day before. He considered himself as having agreed to every part of the Report, except the practical recommendation at the end. (Hear, hear, from the Ministerial benches.) The right hon. gentleman concluded by expressing his opinion, that the discussion of this subject should terminate for the present, as no object could be gained by prolonging it.

Lord Castlereagh agreed with the right hon. gentleman in the propriety of his suggestion, and therefore would only make a single observation. The committee concurred unanimously in the existence of the danger, but disagreed about the practical result of their inquiry. It was therefore determined that every member should reserve his own opinion on that latter point till the question came to be discussed in the House. With regard to little quibbling about the extent of the danger, there was no foundation for it.

Mr. B. Bathurst, Lord Castlereagh, and Lord Milnes, explained.

Sir A. Pigott was anxious to state, that he had attended the committee at the early part of their labours: but when he saw from the evidence, the nature and extent of the danger, he did not think it necessary to attend afterwards, as he knew he could not be brought to concur in the remedy that was proposed.

Mr. Lamb observed, that he had most distinctly stated in the committee, that he could not agree in the recommendation at the conclusion of the Report, as he was determined to go into the House unpledged to any measure, and he should be happy if his hon. friends could convince him that the proposed remedy was unnecessary.

Mr. Brougham said, it was not his intention to prolong the present discussion. He entirely concurred in the motion that the Report should be printed: by being printed it would be better known; and he was satisfied it could not be too well known: the more it was known, the more would its conclusion be reprobated by the country. He only wished, that along with the Report the speech of the noble lord (Milton) should be printed; and, what was still of greater importance, the speech of the other noble lord, member for Yorkshire (Lord Lascelles), which ought to be circulated as widely as the Report; for the noble lord had stated, that concessions took place in the Committee. Now those concessions were not facts on which any conclusion could be founded: they were the mutual accommodations of gentlemen disposed to arrive at some vague conclusion. He had heard the noble lord say, that there was a disposition on all sides to concede, to meet one another half way. The Report, therefore, was not the fair and just view of the state of the country, but the result of compromise and concession. His right hon. friend (Mr. Ponsonby) had said, that the conclusion was all he had to object to; but it should be always remembered, that this conclusion was attached only to a series of concessions.

Lord Lascelles explained. He said, the hon. and learned gentleman might give his speech what publicity he pleased; but it seemed, that he had misunderstood what he stated. What he (Lord L.) had said was, that whenever any thing was drawn up in the Report, which appeared to be stronger than it ought to be, concession was sometimes made, not of facts, that could not be the case, but of the impression which the facts made on the minds of different members of the Committee. Recourse was then had to the evidence, and the expressions were accommodated to that evidence. These were the concessions of which he had spoken. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning was astonished how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brougham) could expect to put an end to discussion by his interpretation of the expression of the noble lord. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord had said nothing that in candour could be misunderstood. He had said, that there were concessions, but not of facts; no, but of opinions and impressions. If there was any thing softened in the Report, it was in order that the concurrence of all should be obtained. There was no concession of fact, still less a disposition to exaggerate any one fact. In such a Committee concession as to fact was impossible; concession as to comparative views of circumstances and relations was not discreditable. Every one stated his own opinion and impression; every one could not come down to the House with a distinct Report containing his own impression; the only mode of proceeding, therefore, was to canvass the evidence till they came to an agreement. He could say, that never had a Committee conducted its inquiry with more candour and equanimity. From the beginning to the end of that investigation, which had excited so much public attention, and called forth such a diversity of opinion, there was not one angry, acrimonious, uncivil, or harsh expression used. There was an anxiety to court discussion on all doubtful points, and an unwillingness to quit any part until all had given their opinions. If two men took a different view of the same point, and upon close inquiry came to a common conclusion, there was nothing improper or discreditable in that. If he were to go to the particular statements of the speeches made by the members of the Committee, he should say, lamenting as he did lament, that this discussion at all took place that night, that they had expressed his ideas, only in better words than he could use. If he differed from the right hon. gentleman opposite as to the conclusion, that was rather matter of inference than an essential part of the Report. For the noble lord opposite he felt the most perfect respect; and he must in his conscience declare, that had he been asked, previously to having heard his speech, what the noble lord thought upon the subject, he should have said, that with the recommendation he disagreed, but there was none whose entire concurrence with every point of fact was more certain and decided.

Lord Folkestone said, that the right hon. gentleman had conceded every point in dispute in this argument. Concession, with respect to impressions, was all that had been stated by the noble lord. The result of the noble lord's speech, in his mind, was, that it was considered a great object in the Committee to produce unanimity, in order to which there was a concession of certain impressions. If, then, twenty men had a particular impression, and one man felt a different impression, the twenty conceded their impressions in order to get the support of one: or if the one, too, conceded somewhat on his part, then the result was the opinion of none of the one and twenty. This was quite sufficient for the conclusion which every man must draw, that there was concession, and this was not denied.

Mr. Canning explained. He said, there had been mutual concessions only when the evidence justified them.

Lord Cochrane remarked, that the evidence laid before the Committee was not different from the evidence which had been laid before a court of justice, where the verdict of a jury had declared the charges to be unfounded in point of fact. It was a pity, it was a matter of the deepest regret, that ex-parte evidence should be received, believed, and acted upon against the whole people of England. In a court of law such evidence was found to have proceeded from a fraudulent and perjured individual. (Hear, hear.) On a recent occasion, disclosures were made that reflected shame and scandal, if not on all the members of his Majesty's Government, at least on those whom they had deluded to support them in subverting the liberties of Englishmen. Without that house, not one member could put his hand upon his breast and say, that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus was necessary: no, it was a subversion of the Constitution; it was an explicit declaration, that England had at length become the land of slaves. What had we witnessed after so many years of war, and privation, and burdens? What was the issue of all this? A degree of suffering and misery that never was equalled, and could not be long endured. Did they believe that Englishmen would be content to die like dogs in a ditch? Well, after all the war, and patience, and misery, which successively tried our temper, came at last such a Report as this—an infamous scandalous libel upon the people of England. (Hear, hear, and cries of order.) He was perfectly in order. It was not fit that we should legislate against the whole people for the faults of a few; besides, those faults had not in one instance been proved, and had been disproved in more than one. He would, therefore repeat, that the Report was an infamous libel, scandalous—

Sir W. Burroughs rose to order. As far as he remembered, there was not one word in the Report imputing blame to the people of England.

The Speaker observed, that with respect to the names which the noble lord attached to the Report, unless he was greatly mistaken, he must say it was most disorderly. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Cochrane said, he bowed to the authority of the Chair, as he had always done, when it was filled in so distinguished a manner by their late Speaker. He had applied the epithets not to any individual of the Committee, but to the Report itself, which he did consider a most scandalous one, because—(Cries of Chair.)

The Speaker said, he must now appeal to the House, whether, in their judgment, the noble lord was not highly disorderly in the language which he persisted in using? (Hear, hear.)

Lord Cochrane said, he submitted; but he was sure the Chair would not have interfered of its own accord. (Order, order.) He should merely state again, that he applied the epithets, which he would not repeat, to the Report, and not to the Committee. His firm conviction was, that the evidence upon which the Report was founded, was not true. No one would believe that there existed any conspiracy in the country, to overturn the Government.

The Report was then ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

THE BUDGET.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the order of the day be read for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the state of the finances.

Mr. Tverney wished the subject to be postponed, rather than to be brought on at so late an hour.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer considered the subject too important, and of too much interest to the House and the nation, to be postponed, or to admit of delay.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had opposed the postponement of this question for the lateness of the hour, (half past 9); 1st, because which he apprehended no opposition to the measure which he had to propose, it being of a nature that admitted of as little objection as any measure of the kind that had ever been submitted to Parliament; 2dly, because much more information than usual had already been given on the subject. The speech from the Throne had directed their attention to the finances, in consequence of which a Committee was appointed to inquire into the revenue and expenditure of the country. The Reports which that Committee had made would relieve him from many details, into which he should otherwise have felt it his duty to enter. He should frequently content himself with referring to their labours, which he was sure would afford the House more satisfaction than any imperfect statement he could offer of his own. Another respect in which the question would require much less time was, the consolidation of the Exchequers of Great Britain and Ireland. Since January last, a very considerable portion of official labour had been directed to reconcile the accounts of Ireland with those of England; and those of the former country were now brought forward in a more convenient and uniform manner than on any prior occasion. This had been effected partly by official diligence, and partly by the act of the House itself: he alluded to the call which had been made by Parliament for the clearing up of all accounts between the English and Irish Exchequers to the 5th of January last, and for removing or cancelling all outstanding grants on the Consolidated Fund, which had not been realized, and were not likely to be realized within any moderate period; the consequence was, that from the 5th of January last, a new account had been opened for the Consolidated Treasuries, and the technical distinctions which had till now existed between them, were no more. The House would have the goodness to observe, that the Committee appointed to inquire into the expenditure and income of the country had not encumbered their Report with a statement of the various branches of the revenue and services of the country, but had on the one side set down the whole amount of the finances of the country, and on the other the sum total of its expenditure. This was the plan which he now intended to follow. In looking to the revenue of Great Britain, it would appear that there was a deficiency in the last year, in the great branches of Customs and Excise, of about 10 per cent. With respect to Ireland there was, he felt, no ground for despondency, although the revenue of that country had fallen off about 20 per cent. But notwithstanding those unfortunate circumstances which naturally rose out of the diminished demand for the produce of an agricultural country, in consequence of the termination of the war, combined with the lamentable failure of the last harvest; there was still every reason to calculate upon the recovery of that country from all its embarrassments, through the operation of her inherent means, and the active industry of her population. In the usual form, he should first go through the Supplies required in the present year, and then state the Ways and Means to meet them. The first item was the Army, which, including 1,500,000*l.* for Extraordinaries, and exclusive of troops in France, amounted to 9,080,000*l.* It would be remembered, that in 1816 the total sum granted under this head of the service was 10,809,737; so that there was a reduction in this year, as compared with the last, of 1,729,737*l.*—The next item was the Navy. Last year, the sum voted amounted to 9,964,195*l.*; the sum now required, exclusive of a grant of 2,000,000*l.* for the reduction of the navy debt, were 6,000,000*l.* Last year 2,000,000*l.* of the navy debt were paid off. The sum appropriated to that purpose was taken from the unapplied money remaining in the Exchequer from the Grants of 1815. The saving, therefore, in this year, in the sum to be applied to the service of the navy, as compared with that of last year, was 3,964,195*l.*—The next head was the Ordnance. The sum required for this year amounted to 1,221,300*l.*: last year the sum voted was 1,613,142*l.* Here a reduction had been effected of 391,842*l.*, being nearly one-fourth of the whole.—The fourth item was, the Miscellaneous Services, which amounted to 1,700,000*l.* Last year the grant was 2,500,000*l.*; so that, under this head, a reduction had been made of no less than 800,000*l.*—The total Supply, therefore, that was called for in the present year, exclusive of the interest of the Funded Debt, for the expense of the several establishments for twelve months—not on the Peace Establishment, for he was far from thinking that we had yet arrived at what might properly be so called—would amount to 18,001,300*l.*, or what, speaking in round numbers, he would call 18,000,000*l.* It would be remembered, that at the opening of the Session, his noble friend (Lord Castlereagh) had estimated the expenditure of the year for the services he had enumerated at 18,375,000*l.* The actual supply called for came below the estimated sum by 375,000*l.* Last year the grants for the same services amounted to 24,887,000*l.* The reduction effected in the present year, it would therefore be seen, fell little short of 7,000,000*l.*, being considerably more than one-fourth, and amounting to very near one-third of the whole.—In addition to the 18,000,000*l.* required for the proper service of the year, a further provision would be necessary on account of the Unfunded Debt. In the first instance there was a charge of 1,900,000*l.* for the interest on Exchequer Bills, the principal of which had been discharged in the course of the present year. This item, though large, the Committee would regard with satisfaction, when they considered how much the improved state of public credit lessened the charge thus incurred in providing for the Ways and Means of the year. A proper idea of this might be formed, when it was considered that what cost the country 1,900,000*l.* for the service of 1816, would in the present year create but a charge of 1,500,000*l.*; and when it was farther borne in mind, that a few years ago the same operation would have occasioned an expense of 2,500,000*l.* The Sinking Fund on the money thus raised would amount to 330,000*l.* The Unfunded Debt was at present 33,000,000*l.* On winding up the accounts between the English and Irish Exchequers, a further advance had become necessary, in order to clear all up to the 5th of January last, from which period they had started on a new account. This had caused a grant to be called for, in order to make good the permanent charges of Ireland up to that time, of 246,508*l.* Towards the reduction of the Navy and Transport Debt, a supply was demanded of 1,660,000*l.* There was thus, it would be seen, a new total of 4,136,508*l.* The different items and the grand total were as follow:—

He had now to call the attention of the Committee to the manner in which he proposed to meet the above demands. The first then he should notice as applicable to the Ways and Means of the year, was the balance of Annual Duties. After deducting the sums granted out of the duties for 1815 and 1816, there remained 3,000,000*l.* in the Exchequer, for which he should now take credit. He proposed also to avail himself of the surplus arising on the issues of Exchequer Bills for 1815 and 1816; the sum for the former year being 15,749*l.* and for the latter 1,849,810*l.* These sums formed what, in the language of the Exchequer, was called surplus Ways and Means. They did not, however, make a genuine surplus, but might be regarded as disposable ways and means. A great part were issued on Excise Duties not yet realized, and the whole amounted to 1,865,559*l.* The produce of the whole of the Excise Duties, which were proposed to be continued, after satisfying the grant charged upon them for the year 1816, amounted to 1,300,000*l.* These were a continuation of war taxes, which amounted last year to 3,500,000*l.*, of which the above sum was the balance, after allowing a sufficient sum to satisfy the grant of that year.—The next sum to which he should advert, was the amount of the Consolidated Fund remaining at the disposal of Parliament on the 5th of April last. This money arose from grants up to January last, and the sum in the Exchequer was, 1,225,978*l.* The deficiency of the Consolidated Fund, up to the 6th of January last, amounting to 600,000*l.*, had been made good by Exchequer bills.—The Lottery was taken at 250,000*l.*; and though this appeared a larger sum than that of last year, yet, when the whole account was compared, it would be found that the lottery was reduced 50,000*l.* instead of being that much higher.—The next item he had to state to the Committee was that arising from the sale of Old Naval Stores, the amount of which he estimated for the last year at 400,000*l.*—There was one item more: it was the arrears of the Property-Tax, of which a considerable sum was due up to January and April last. The whole received, or to be received up to the year ending on the 5th of April 1818, was 1,500,000*l.*—These several items of Ways and Means amounted altogether to 9,541,537*l.*; so that there was required to make good the supply 12,600,000*l.* This he proposed to raise by Irish Treasury bills to the amount of 3,600,000*l.* and a new issue of 9,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills.—Having concluded these statements, he would now recapitulate the different items of the

The first total of the Ways and Means which he had stated, namely, the 9,541,537*l.* might be regarded as the ready money in the Exchequer; but that was the whole which the ordinary resources offered for covering the expenditure. It was therefore clear, that the above balance of 12,600,000*l.* was necessary to equalize the Ways and Means and the Supply; and he was convinced that that sum could not be raised in a way more advantageous to the country than that which he had proposed. He should in the first place endeavour to explain to the Committee how the account of the 3,600,000*l.* Irish Treasury Bills stood. The House would recollect that, before Easter, there had been a vote for repaying certain Irish Exchequer Bills. Upon communication with the Bank of Ireland, it was found that the directors of that establishment were disposed to exchange the bills they held for new bills. These with an additional issue of 100,000*l.* made out the amount he had stated: but as the Bank of Ireland required 5 per cent. interest, it was not thought advisable to raise a larger sum in that way. Only a small part of the Irish Treasury Bills were due in December and January next, and it would therefore be time enough to make arrangements for paying them off after the next meeting of Parliament. The remaining sum of 9,000,000*l.* he proposed, as he had already stated, to raise by Exchequer Bills; and he was the more induced to take this proportion of the deficiency in that way, as the Bank of England in its negotiations would be satisfied with a more moderate rate of interest than was paid in Ireland. Before the meeting of Parliament he could have borrowed 12 millions, but from the appearance of the money market, he thought it better not to avail himself of it. He had indeed found the state of the market such, that by issuing Exchequer Bills in preference to borrowing, he saved 300,000*l.* The power of the money market to take off 9,000,000*l.* of Exchequer Bills, he thought could not be questioned, when it was considered, that of the 42,000,000*l.* previously issued, 27,000,000*l.* had been discharged in the course of the present session. There were, therefore, only Bills to the amount of 15,000,000*l.* outstanding. The 9,000,000*l.* he now proposed to add would make 24,000,000*l.* and, all things considered, he apprehended, that there would not be more thrown into the market than could be easily absorbed. It ought at the same time to be recollected, that as the interest had been reduced from 5 per cent. to 3½, there was a saving in that respect of 1½ per cent. From the measure he proposed, he therefore had reason to expect great advantage both to the agriculture and commerce of the country, and he doubted whether it would have been possible to derive equal benefit from any other arrangement. Although the revenue, from causes over which his Majesty's Ministers could have no control, had fallen short six or eight millions, there had been an evident improvement in our public credit. It might be recollected, that when he addressed the House last year on the financial situation of the country, the three per cent. consols. were only between 62 and 63; at present they were above 74.* This was an improvement of 12 per cent. on 62, which, calculated upon 100*l.* stock, was equal to nearly 20 per cent. The Exchequer Bills were then at an interest of 5½ per cent. Those now in circulation bore an interest of only 3½ per cent.; and on this very day those bills bore 12*s.* premium. These were circumstances which proved the manifest advantage of the system he had pursued, and now proposed to continue. But it was not in the money-market only that the beneficial influence of that system had been felt. A proportional improvement was experienced in every description of property in the country. One of its most important results had been the resumption of cash payments by the Bank. When he had suggested that the Bank might be enabled to pay in specie in the course of two years, his statement was received with ridicule and incredulity. The suggestion which he threw out, had, however, been completely realized; for the payments in cash had been resumed for every useful purpose. He could not but congratulate the House and the country upon the removal of the doubts and alarms which had been entertained on this subject. None of the evils which had been so profusely foretold, had occurred; and this great change had been accomplished without any shock or danger to public credit. Those who had with regret anticipated these mischievous consequences, he was sure would now join with him in rejoicing at the state in which our country was now placed. The notes of the Bank of England had even during the restriction been preferred to those of every other bank in Europe. What then must be the effect of the removal of that restriction? He felt that he could confidently anticipate the capacity of the Bank to resume its cash payments by the 5th of July twelvemonth, which was the period fixed by law. The fact was, that any Bank-note was at present convertible with ease into cash; and such was the facility of the exchange, that our Bank-notes were, in every nation upon the Continent, equivalent to bullion.—With regard to the public debt, the expectations he held out last year had been more than realized. It had been reduced at least 3,000,000*l.*: the balance of debt repaid exceeded this sum. The amount paid in 1816 had been stated at 9,400,000*l.*; but there was a deduction of 6,000,000*l.* charged for 1815, which had not been paid, so that the actual balance discharged was 3,400,000*l.* This was most satisfactory; but it was not all, for at the date of the 1st of October, 1815, 32 millions of capital stock had actually been purchased up. If, instead of borrowing Exchequer Bills, he had funded capital stock, it would have been impossible to have operated a reduction of the debt to the same extent. Whether there would be an equal diminution of debt in the present year as in the last, was what he could not pretend to assert. He did not wish to state a positive opinion on the subject; but he estimated that, with some addition to the 12,600,000*l.* he had already mentioned, he might have to borrow altogether about 14,000,000*l.*, and that it was probable there would be paid off about 16½. There might, therefore, be a diminution not of 3½ as in the last year, but probably of 2½ millions. With the improvement of our finances, he looked forward to a speedy improvement in the internal comfort and prosperity of the country. (Hear, hear.) He did not consider this expectation unreasonable. A great part of the public distress arose, not from any derangement in our domestic affairs, but from the general state of Europe. At a time when all over the Continent many were struggling for the mere necessities of life, it was not to be expected that there could be a great demand for our manufactures. This country, fortunately, had not been reduced to so low a state as some others had, but we could not expect to escape without sharing in the general calamity. If, however, Providence blessed us with a favourable harvest, he should confidently hope to see a steady restoration of our revenues and our former prosperity. He had taken the liberty of stating thus much, merely to impress on the recollections of the Committee, that even under the unfavourable circumstances of the last year, all the benefits which he had held out as likely to result from the plans he had proposed, had been more than realized.—He anticipated a still more sensible improvement; but he sincerely trusted, that the country would never find it necessary to resort to any of those desperate and dangerous remedies which some persons had thought it proper to recommend. It was alone upon the firmness of Parliament and the loyalty of the people, that the security of public credit and the restoration of national prosperity depended. He had now only to state, that he estimated the amount of the interest, the Exchequer and Treasury Bills, necessary to meet the supply, at 450,000*l.* and he contemplated that that sum would be lowered by the reduction which would take place in the funded debt, in the course of the next session of Parliament. Thus the public would be subjected to no new charge whatever.—The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving a resolution for the issue of the Exchequer bills.

Mr. Tierney rose.—He said, that as the right hon. gentleman had now made his statement, he trusted that he would not be disposed to bring up the Report that night, nor press any further discussion at so late an hour; but name an early day when the subject might be taken into consideration.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his readiness to postpone such of the Resolutions as were chiefly calculated to give rise to any debate. He thought that Monday might be a very proper day for the House to enter into the discussion.

Mr. Tierney replied, that the more this subject was considered, the more discussion, he was afraid, would result from it, as nothing could be more placid at present than the statement of the right hon. gentleman. His (Mr. T.'s) object was, to have an entire discussion, with the view of including in it the consideration of the Report of the Finance Committee.—For this purpose he suggested Tuesday as a convenient day.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, no man could be more disposed than he was, to afford every kind of accommodation to the right hon. gentleman and the House; but he thought that matters of this kind, on which so much depended, should not be delayed. The House met tomorrow, and probably he might bring up some of the Resolutions then, and let the consideration be deferred to Monday.

Mr. Tierney said, there was no occasion for remarking that on this question much depended, for it was undoubtedly true, that the House and the public were feelingly alive to it, and that, therefore, it should be discussed with the greatest deliberation. He did not see on what grounds Tuesday could be objected to as an unsuitable day, and while he did not refuse to agree, that the Report be received to-morrow, he could not but consider it absurd that any discussion on Saturday should for a moment be thought of.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had in his speech stated, that the Bank of England had resumed cash payments. This he was somewhat astonished to hear, and he would ask the right hon. gentleman to state when the Bank had commenced doing so, and whether it was the fact that they had at all begun to pay in cash? (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought the hon. gentleman could hardly be so ignorant of the import of what he had said, as not to understand that the sense of his observation was, that the Bank might now be fairly considered as having virtually recommenced their payments in specie.

Mr. Grenfell wished to ask the right hon. gentleman another question. Could he positively assure the House, that any person by going to the Bank with a ten pound note, would receive cash for it?—An hon. friend of his had supposed that the restrictions on the Bank expired on the 5th of July next, whereas, in fact, they did not expire till the 5th of July, 1818. Would the right hon. gentleman be kind enough to answer the question, and say whether it was or was not the case, that the Bank would pay any person ten pounds in cash, who went to them with a 10*l.* Bank note?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if he hon. gentleman took ten l. notes of a certain class to the Bank, he would be paid in cash for them. This was what he meant when he alluded to the resumption of cash payments. (*Hear, hear, and a laugh from the Opposition benches.)

*The following notice of the Bank's resumption of payments in cash on and after the 1st of October, 1817, appeared in the London Gazette of Tuesday, September 23, under the authority of Mr. Speaker, according to the terms of the Act.—“In pursuance of the directions of an Act, passed in the 37th year of the reign of his present Majesty King George III., intituled, an Act for confirming and continuing, for a limited time, the restriction contained in the minute of Council, of the 26th of February, 1797, in payments of cash by the Bank;” and also of the several Acts since passed, for continuing and amending the same;

I do hereby direct, that there be inserted forthwith in the London Gazette, the following notice from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, dated 18th September, 1817, namely:—

“That, on and after the 1st October next, the Bank will be ready to pay cash for their notes of every description, dated prior to the 1st Jan. 1817.”

CHARLES MANNERS SUTTON, Speaker.

Sept. 22, 1817.

Sir J. Newport complained of the exaggerated representations of national prosperity, made by the right hon. gentleman. The House ought to institute an accurate inquiry, and not give credit to these accounts, because the Budget had been brought forward at so late a period in the session, and at so late an hour of the night. For his own part, he could not conceive how the prospect held out with regard to the Irish revenue, was to be made good. It was desirable that some explanation should be given, why Treasury Bills, at five per cent., had been suffered to remain in the Bank of Ireland, when they might be negotiated at a far more moderate rate in England. He knew no reason, except a wish to favour the Bank of Ireland, that should prevent the right hon. gentleman from making them payable in this country.

After some farther conversation, as to the most convenient day for bringing up the Report, it was finally settled that it should be received on Monday, and the Committee was ordered to sit again on that day.

OFFICES (SCOTLAND) REGULATION BILL.] This Bill was read a third time, and passed.

SIGNET AND PRIVY SEAL OFFICES BILL.] This bill was considered in a Committee, and ordered to be reported to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, June 21.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] On the motion of Sir W. Burroughs, it was ordered that a message should be sent to the Lords, requesting to have a copy of the Report made to their lordships by the Secret Committee, on the 19th instant, respecting the state of the country.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] Sir G. Warrender brought up the Report of these Estimates, and the several resolutions were agreed to, and bills ordered accordingly.

LANDLORD AND TENANT LAW.] Mr. Lockhart brought in his bill for regulating the costs of distress for small rents, which was read a first time.

PRISONS.] On the motion of Mr. Bennet, it was ordered that all the papers presented to the House, relative to the King's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons, should be printed.

Various bills were then forwarded through their respective stages, and the House adjourned.

Monday, June 23.

A message was brought from the Commons by Mr. Braddon and other members, requesting the attendance of Lords Dynvor, Cavender, and Amherst, to give evidence before the Committee, the Administration of Justice in Wales.—

* It was told that the House would send an est prier by messengers of its own. An answer was afterwards sent, stating that their lordships had leave to attend.

Another message was brought from the Commons, by Sir W. Burroughs and others, requesting a copy of the Report of the Lords' Committee, relative to traitorous practices and conspiracies.—A copy was delivered to Sir W. Burroughs at the bar.

Lord Colchester's Annuity Bill was read a third time and passed, and several other bills were forwarded in their respective stages.

Monday, June 23.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition of inhabitants of London and Westminster, against employing boys in sweeping chimnies.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into this subject was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SIGNET AND PRIVY SEAL OFFICES BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

WARWICK, HERTFORD, &c. PETITIONS.—HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Sir C. Mordaunt presented a petition of Freeholders and Inhabitants of the county of Warwick, against the continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and observed, that he was sorry he could not, consistently with his sense of public duty, support the prayer of the petitioners.

On the motion that the petition be brought up,

Mr. Dugdale remarked, that in Warwickshire, and some of the neighbouring counties, it was the general opinion of the magistracy, that unless the additional powers conferred on the Executive Government were confirmed, they would be unable to preserve the public tranquillity.

The petition was then brought up, and ordered to be printed.

It was as follows:—"That the petitioners have seen with the utmost grief and dismay the operation of that Act, so essential to the personal safety of every individual in the kingdom, commonly called the Act of Habeas Corpus, suspended at the commencement of the present session; that as the Act of Habeas Corpus is founded upon Magna Charta, and was only passed in order to give greater force and efficacy to the provisions of that statute, to suspend that Act, without the most imperious and indisputable necessity, is, in the opinion of the petitioners, a gross violation of one of the leading principles of the Constitution, and of the dearest rights of Englishmen; that such necessity can only exist when the danger to the constitutional government of the country is so great and imminent, as to be wholly beyond the reach of the established laws, and of the ordinary powers possessed by the Executive; that the petitioners have in vain sought to discover any proof of such danger having existed at the time when Parliament thought fit to suspend the Act of

Habeas Corpus; the petitioners cannot see any proof of it in the Reports of the Committees of the two Houses of Parliament, Reports, which in some of their most material allegations, have been contradicted and disproved, and the whole of which, being founded upon ex-parte statements, without the persons implicated having had any opportunity of answering the accusations made against them, or of explaining their conduct in any of the transactions in which they were involved, afford good reason for doubting the correctness of the conclusions drawn from the evidence produced; the petitioners viewing all the circumstances of the case, cannot but think that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was resorted to by his Majesty's Ministers, not through fear of any real danger to the Government, but in conjunction with other measures, in order to stifle the voice of the people, and prevent them from obtaining that economy and retrenchment in the public expenditure, that redress of grievances, and that amelioration of the state of the country, which from every part of it were demanded; the petitioners are equally at a loss to discover, in the present state of the country, any thing to warrant the further Suspension of the Act of Habeas Corpus. The peaceable and orderly behaviour of the immense majority of the inhabitants of this kingdom, under circumstances the most calculated to excite every angry passion, and to rouse into action every latent particle of disaffection, in the midst of ruin, poverty and starvation, and under the irritation which the neglect of the situation of the people, by the Administration, must have created, affords, on the contrary, the strongest evidence that no real danger to the Government at this moment exists, still less such a danger as is beyond the control of the ordinary laws, and demands such an extraordinary interposition of the authority of Parliament. They are the more inclined to doubt the reality of any such danger from observing, that in the last Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, it is admitted that the facts stated rest principally upon the evidence either of persons implicated in the transactions to which their evidence relates, or of others who joined in those transactions, for the purpose of giving information to the magistrates, or to the Secretary of State, and the language and conduct of some of whom the Committee state they have seen reason to apprehend, may, in some instances, have had the effect of encouraging those designs, which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting; it must be obvious to the House, how little reliance ought to be placed upon the evidence of persons in such circumstances, evidence which, if unsupported by other testimony, would not be sufficient in a Court of Justice, to convict a person charged with a common misdemeanor. They are the more persuaded of the efficiency of the ordinary laws, to avert any threatened danger to the Constitution, from the consideration that in every instance of actual riot or disturbance mentioned in the Reports, or which has since come to the knowledge of the public, it appears that the same was immediately suppressed by the magistrates, exercising the ordinary powers entrusted to them; the petitioners feel the more apprehension at such extraordinary powers to his present Ministers, from their conviction that measures lately pursued by them, naturally lead to the subversion of the liberties of England; a large Standing Army has been kept up in time of Peace; the Habeas Corpus Act has been suspended; Bills have been passed materially affecting the right of petition, and directly tending to prevent any expression of popular opinion; and not content with these measures, so hostile to the principles of the Constitution, they have assumed that power of dispensing with, and suspending of, the laws by their own authority, without the consent of Parliament, which was one of the charges against James the Second, and materially contributed to induce the people of England to withdraw their allegiance from that Sovereign, and to place the present reigning family upon the Throne of these Realms; the petitioners therefore entreat the House, that, taking the premises into their most serious consideration, they will adopt such measures as shall prevent the liberties of England from being sacrificed to the real or pretended fears of his Majesty's Ministers; they will repeal those laws by which the right of petition is so materially infringed; and that they will resist every attempt which may be made to continue the Suspension of the Act of Habeas Corpus."

Mr. Brand presented a petition of Freeholders and Inhabitants of Hertford, against a continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The hon. member then presented a Petition of Paul Thomas Lemaitre, of the City of London, which was ordered to be printed. It set forth, "that at a distance of two hundred miles from the metropolis, the petitioner lately heard reports of the proposition having been made by his Majesty's Ministers to Parliament for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; the petitioner thought it an imperious duty he owed himself, his family, and his country, to submit to the House the following narrative, in order that the amount of confidence to be placed in the hands of the great Officers of State should be duly appreciated by the House; the petitioner accordingly hastened to town, but he arrived a few hours too late; the discussion of the measure of the Suspension Bill was already near its close, and shortly after the petitioner reached the Lobby of the House was passed; the general reports that have reached the ears of the petitioner, that it is now proposed to obtain their assent to a similar bill, extending the Suspension for a further period of time, determines the petitioner to entreat the earnest attention of the House to this his petition, containing a detail of facts he will not attempt to characterize, and a recital of particulars in which several of his Majesty's present advisers have acted a distinguished part; that on the 27th of September 1794, the petitioner being then only eighteen years of age, was arrested on a charge of treasonable practices, and having undergone various examinations before the Privy Council, was fully committed on a charge of high treason; that the petitioner, having endured all the horrors of solitary confinement for thirty-two weeks in the Cold Bath Fields prison, not to mention the cruel oppressions of its keeper, during which period he had frequently demanded, in applications to the Privy Council, to be brought to a public trial, his father was informed by Mr. Justice Ford, then private secretary to the Duke of Portland, Secretary of State, that upon giving two sureties of fifty pounds each he should be liberated, and these terms the petitioner was constrained to accept; that after a short interval the petitioner received a letter from Mr. Secretary Dundas, requiring his attendance at the Treasury Chambers; the petitioner attended at the time appointed, and sent in his card to the Privy Council, then sitting, and having waited from the morning until it was late in the day without having received any communication, the petitioner expressed to several his impatience, and was at length informed the Privy Council had broken up, and the members long since had left the office; the petitioner in course retired; that shortly after this proceeding, the petitioner was informed, at eleven o'clock at night, his name had been included with others in a bill of indictment for high treason; the petitioner immediately retained Counsel to surrender him, at the opening of the Court the next morning; the Judge inquired of the petitioner as to his identity, and the petitioner answered, that although his description as he understood had not been faithfully given in the indictment, he the petitioner had been lately involved in a similar accusation, and that as he desired nothing so much as a public opportunity for the justification of his character, he now most anxiously presented himself; the petitioner, as he anticipated, was committed to the gaol of Newgate; that after an imprisonment of some weeks the petitioner was conducted to the bar of the Old Bailey, and was there placed beside three individuals, one of whom (his bookseller) he had never had a moment's conversation with, except upon matters of business; a second, with whom a private word had never passed, and a third, who to his knowledge he had never in the course of his life either seen or heard of, previously at least to his apprehension: the petitioner being called upon to plead to the Indictment then read to him, waived the informality of erroneous description, and pleaded Not Guilty; after the anxiety, labour, and expense of preparing a defence, and after suffering an imprisonment of sixteen weeks, the petitioner was again put to the bar, where Mr. Attorney-

General, now Lord Chancellor Eldon, informed the Court he had no evidence to produce, and the petitioner was acquitted; that the petitioner was again arrested 1798, and was again committed to the gaol of Newgate on a charge of high treason: that after upwards of one year's close and solitary confinement, the communication of the physician's report by the gaoler Mr. Kirby to the Privy Council, that the debilitated state of the petitioner's health was likely to prove fatal, procured, as the petitioner believes, a proposition made him by the said gaoler Mr. Kirby, that the petitioner might obtain his liberation upon the condition that he would give security to leave the country during the war; the petitioner gave for answer, that in whatever danger his health might be involved, he would agree to no terms short of the full and public justification of his character, too long suspended in doubt, and yet dearer to him than the life he now hazarded; the petitioner was shortly after removed to Reading gaol; the petitioner begs leave to inform the House, that during these several and long periods of confinement, the Habeas Corpus Act Suspension Bill had been several times renewed, and the petitioner having learned that a proposition was now again made for its renewal for another considerable period of time, forwarded, through the kind interference of Mr. Charles Grey, a petition to the House of Commons, alleging that the petitioner, with a full consciousness of entire innocence, had suffered two years' unintermitting, solitary and close confinement, beside the heavy suffering of former imprisonments, and the ruinous expenses of an unnecessary defence, praying the House that they would call the petitioner to their bar, and institute such inquiry as should shield him from continued incarceration; but this petition, he was informed through a communication he had the honour to receive from Mr. Grey, was rejected; that the petitioner, having been at length confined upon this occasion about three years, was called upon by a King's messenger and other officers, and conveyed back to London to be enlarged upon his own recognizance; that having been taken before Mr. Justice Ford, this gentleman congratulated the petitioner upon the instructions he had received to offer liberation from such long imprisonment upon terms amounting to little more than form, namely, personal recognizance for one thousand pounds; the petitioner however refused to accede to these terms, alleging that the length and severity of the imprisonment made it more imperiously necessary that he and the public should become at last acquainted with the grounds upon which he had been oppressed by such accumulated suffering; that he understood the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill was about to expire, and that the Minister advising its suspension had tendered and had had his resignation accepted by his Majesty; that therefore the petitioner considered that the reign of the laws being about to be resumed in full efficiency, it became him, in defence of his character, as many years unjustly subjected to suspicion, to suffer rather again for a short season, and be thereby enabled to challenge and meet the machinations of those who had heaped upon his head such accumulated suffering. Mr. Justice Ford expostulated, but the petitioner felt it no less a public than a private duty to maintain firmly his opinion, and was committed to the Parliament Street Hotel in charge of the Messenger: hence the petitioner addressed a memorial to his grace, the late duke of Portland, demanding an unconditional liberation or a public trial, but the answer to this application was in the shape of a new warrant of commitment for high treason to Tothill Fields Bridewell, in which prison the petitioner was compelled to pay two guineas and an half per week for lodging and board, or associate with the felons; at the next ensuing term the petitioner applied to the Court of King's Bench for an Habeas, which Lord Kenyon having desired time to consider of, the next day refused, as he expressed himself in answer to the expostulations of the petitioner's Solicitor, upon his responsibility; after a short interval a proposition was made in Parliament again to renew the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: the petitioner verily believing the dread which the Ministers entertained of the exposure of their measures, an exposure which the examination of his case would necessarily involve, was mainly instrumental in inducing this measure, repeated his petitions, renewed the detail of his sufferings, and intreated that no measure should be adopted which might have for effect to perpetuate them, but the Suspension bill was once more passed and received the royal assent. Mr. Justice Ford on the following morning called at the prison, and renewing the proposal of the former terms of enlargement, the petitioner, unable to sustain singly a conflict with power so disproportionate, and the prospect of a defence of character at the probable sacrifice of interminable imprisonment, agreed at length to give his own recognizance for future appearance if called upon; restoration to society, with at best an equivocal character, with the deepest sacrifice of property and of health, and with a more frightful and fatal wound in the loss of a dear parent, who having in the first stage of persecution been informed by the officers that they had seized upon the petitioner the damning evidence of guilt, had taken to her bed and rose no more! these considerations weighed down the mind of the petitioner with the most bitter agony, and in order to obtain the means of a public investigation of such extraordinary transactions, he determined, upon mature consideration, to bring actions against his Majesty's Ministers and the Chief Justice in the Court of King's Bench; the petitioner gave his Solicitor instructions accordingly, but to his utter mortification he found bills immediately introduced into both Houses of Parliament for the indemnity of all the parties concerned; the petitioner lost not a moment in petitioning against these measures, but his exertions were fruitless, his petitions unavailing; the petitioner has been many years endeavouring to recover his station in society, and to resist the too fatal consequences attending such treatment; he had repeatedly petitioned to have the charges against him, if any had really existed, investigated at the bar of the House, and for some remuneration for the greater part of seven years of sufferings and expenses of the most afflicting nature; he had adopted whatever, of other expedients, at any time presented which might lead to an examination of his case and the justification of his conduct and character, but having made every endeavour and urged his claims in vain, he has for some time sought to bring his mind into a state of resignation, and with a knowledge that, as far as regarded the petitioner, the old pretences for the Suspension of the Act of Habeas Corpus were utterly and in every respect groundless, the petitioner embraces this opportunity most solemnly to declare before his country, personified by the House, and with an equal solemnity as if he stood in the presence of Almighty God, that never in word, nor in deed, neither in whisper, insinuation, nor in fact, had he ever received knowledge or intimation, nor was he ever party to any of the alleged treasons of which he has understood himself to stand charged, and on account of which he has suffered so grievously, nor of any other treasons or conspiracies whatever; that after the sad experience of the past he petitioner trembles for the future, and believing himself as much or as little deserving of ensure and surveillance at this period as at any former period of his life, and that in consequence of the renewal of the Suspension Bill now proposed, may be a renewal of suffering however unmerited, the petitioner anxiously implores the House that they will allow him to verify these allegations at their bar if they be doubted; that he House will refuse their assent to the proposed Suspension Bill, which will, if passed into a law, again have for effect to put the petitioner and the whole people of England out of the protection of those revered Laws securing their personal freedom, which may involve the family of the petitioner in utter ruin, and again subject his character for integrity and love of country to have been endeavouring to re-establish, to a repetition of the bitter, cruel and destructive calamity too nearly alike consequent upon such suspicion and actual guilt."

[UNFUNDED DEBT.] On the motion of Mr. Tierney, Accounts were ordered of the unfunded debt in Exchequer bills outstanding, to the latest period to which the same could be made up; distinguishing under what acts issued, and what part of the same was unprovided for.

[WAYS AND MEANS.] The Report was deferred till to-morrow, and the sitting of the Committee till Wednesday.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.
Lord Castlereagh, in rising to call the attention of the House to the bill now on their table from the House of Lords, declared that no individual could feel more deeply than himself the importance of the subject, or the amount of the responsibility that attached to Ministers in recommending a course of proceeding which involved the suspension of the most valuable rights of the subject; but he thought there could be no difference of opinion on the principle of the measure, and that there was no one present who would contend that under such circumstances it might not be necessary. The question therefore was, whether the situation of the country was such that its internal tranquillity could no longer be preserved by the action of the ordinary laws, and whether some extraordinary powers ought not now to be resorted to, or at all events some remedial measure other than the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. He trusted, that he had placed this issue fairly before the House. There was no difference of opinion on the question, whether or no danger existed; and strong measures it was necessary to adopt, for the purpose of overcoming this danger. Strong he admitted them to be; but in arguing the question, he protested against any inference that Ministers were disposed to form their opinions under an undue bias; they had, at least, as fair opportunities of forming a judgment on the subject as any other individual, and were as likely to come to a safe conclusion. The present measure had often been discussed as if Ministers had some special interest of their own, and promoted it either for the enlargement of their power, or with other views of an ambitious nature; but he hoped he addressed an audience too liberal to attribute such motives to them under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, or that they had any other interest than that of reconciling the opinions of the public. Among all the arduous tasks which they had had to perform, none was so arduous or so painful as this; nothing so lamentable as, day after day, to lie under imputations for every event that happened, and to call for extraordinary powers, under the most severe penalties, if they made an improper use of them. He trusted that his Majesty's Government had shewn, in the early part of the session, an anxious desire to see, even at the hazard of being again obliged to come to Parliament before the termination of the session, and of travelling again through the painful discussion, if by any possibility the country could be delivered from the measure within a short period. He trusted, too, that in confining it to this part of the United Kingdom, they had shewn the same desire to give as little extension as possible to its operation, as they had shewn to limit its duration. Nothing in the general conduct of the Government, or in that of the secretary of State, had occurred, which ought to excite jealousy: their only object was to afford protection to the Constitution, and to the liberty and tranquillity of the people against the dangers which surrounded them. With respect to the Committee, he could most conscientiously state, that Ministers had shewn no disposition to urge it to any particular recommendation. They would have been perfectly ready to concur in confining the Report to the mere statement of facts in evidence; and with leaving it to the House to come to the discussion of this question on its own merits—namely, the internal state of the country, as laid before that Committee. There was another mode of viewing this subject, to which he should now advert—namely, that Parliament could not pass such a bill, without being guilty of a libel on the people of England; and that it was a species of bill of indictment against the whole people. But he protested against the measure being considered as levelled against the people of England; on the contrary, he claimed it in behalf of the people of England; in behalf of the loyal, the industrious, and the tranquil, to save them from machinations contrary to their interests and those of the nation at large. It might be looked at with the greatest alarm by the seditious, for such, he was sorry to say, there were: it would arrest those persons in their guilty march: but the loyal, and those whose pursuits were honest and orderly, would be inspired with confidence; every one of them would lie down in security, and, in his conscience he believed, that they would be grateful for it. But it might be said, that the very description which had been given of the treasonable persons, disproved the necessity of resorting to this measure: it might be contended, that, supposing the existence of treason, and admitting all the facts to be true, the delegation, the nomination of leaders, and the simultaneous rising; admitting all these, still the treason, in the hands in which it existed in the country, was not of a description to excite any great alarm. His views of the subject were very different. It was certainly a great consolation to find, that the property and the general surface of the country were sound: the mischief was chiefly among the lower classes of manufacturers: but he could not go along with those who thought the danger small. Population in some places was almost exclusively manufacturing, and contagion might increase among them more rapidly than among those in agricultural employment. The dissatisfied themselves did not look upon their means as contemptible. They seemed to consider the circumstances of former rebellions. Treason might be dangerous even though people of rank were unconnected with it; and it might cover the country with desolation. History informed us of the insurrection in the reign of Richard II, which seemed to be taken as a kind of model by the present conspirators, who had argued on the instance of the 100,000 men said to have met at Blackheath. They kept the precedent in view, and calculated on similar results: under the mask of petitioning for Reform, they were to come up to London to hold a parley with the Sovereign, and to enforce their demands. This kind of treason might produce the greatest calamities, even though it did not subvert the State. He would therefore protest against its being represented as not formidable to the Government. It might be more destructive than a disputed succession, in which persons of consequence had a control, and thereby prevented the general ruin and destruction of social order. He wished to call the attention of the House to the outline of the evidence. He was addressing himself to two classes of persons—those who had supported the measure in February, and those who had opposed it. Let them look at the events which occurred before the middle of April, and those which had happened since. He was prepared to contend that it was quite impossible for those who supported the bill in February to hesitate now. (Hear.) The case at present was much stronger than at first; so that even those who opposed its former enactment might now vote for its renewal. It would not be prudent to leave the country without this protection, after the confirmation of the allegations of the first Report, and in the view of all the existing circumstances. An impulse would be given to the traitorous and disaffected by those who would be let loose again on society. That the case had acquired more strength was his conscientious persuasion. The result of a late trial did not negative the propositions of the first Report. The verdict did not disprove the existence of a treasonable conspiracy. After considering all the collateral circumstances which had been brought forward, all the arguments of the professional men who conducted the prosecution, and what was said by those who defended the prisoner, no rational man, none who did not shut his eyes, could fail to see that the treason stated in the Report was confirmed by subsequent events. It became then a duty to weigh well the dangers of a premature termination of the law. The evidence of danger was of such an accumulated nature and extent as to remove all doubts. Attempts might be made to shew that the agents of Government had occasioned and encouraged the treason, and that without them it would not have been heard of. Down to the middle of April no such interference had taken place. As to Mr. Oliver, who was supposed to be a moving cause of the mischief, he did not leave London before the middle of April; therefore, his conduct could not be applicable to former events. He went on his first mission on the 17th of April. (Loud cries of hear.) The noble lord hoped gentlemen would not let their zeal overcome their prudence, and that they would not be too precipitate. (Hear.) The explosion of the treason had now been seen, and the first Report was confirmed, with which Mr. Oliver had nothing to do. The evidence came through a number of channels, corroborated by the nature of the case and the events, and by parties not employed by Government. A right conclusion was that he was a party to every word of the first Report. (Mr. Ponsonby rises and assents.) The truth of it was now at the progress of treason by comparison of dates, at three different periods at which an effort was determined upon, and when insurrection was contemplated for a particular day. Two of these preceded the period of Mr. Oliver's appearances. Mr. Oliver had nothing to do with the projects of the 9th March at Manchester, which were to lead to the march to London, and which was to be carried on under the pretence and mask of asking for Reform. Those who supposed these conspirators destitute of faculties would change their opinions if they had witnessed their examinations before the Council, and would be surprised, perhaps, at their astuteness and the sort of legal knowledge they had acquired, by which they endeavoured to cover their real designs with a constitutional cloak, and to make out a case something short of treason. The treasonable object of forcing a change of the Government was discussed among them with considerable ability, and although the meeting had been dissolved, and the intention of the conspirators frustrated, they were not in the least discouraged, but resolved to bring matters to what they considered a point, and to act with more boldness than before. The plan for the 30th of March had in it every character belonging to treason—attacking the barracks, for instance. The rising in the town of Manchester at that time, was to be combined with simultaneous risings in all the other manufacturing towns. Nothing but the arrest of the delegates at Ardwick Bridge, near Manchester, on the 28th, could have prevented the calamity with which that town was threatened. This, as well as the meeting of the 9th, was totally disconnected with Mr. Oliver, or any other person in the employment of Government. The House would now allow him to say a very few words with respect to what had taken place since the employment of Mr. Oliver, because a colour had been given to that transaction which did not belong to it, and because an active attempt had been made to create an impression, that Mr. Oliver had been sent down to excite the people to insurrection. It had been said, that the very circumstance of such a man (he had no knowledge of him individually) having been directed to interfere in the business, served to encourage and call forth the disorder. He did not feel that it was an improper exercise of their discretionary powers, if Ministers apprehended mischief, to send some persons to work themselves into the confidence of the disaffected, in order to protect the country against the evils which they meditated. But Mr. Oliver came of himself to Government, and stated to the Home Department, that he had been applied to by a delegate from the country to obtain information respecting the discontent in the metropolis. It would be improper in him to suffer any other name to be known on this occasion than that of Oliver himself. Mr. Oliver was not employed, in the first instance, to go to the country and make acquaintances among the people there, and to use language encouraging them to rebellion against the Government. When he applied to the Home Department, he stated that he had been invited by a delegate, a man of known character as a traitor, who came to London to see what was the disposition of the people there, and to give encouragement, that even without them, the people of the country would make the attempt themselves. Mr. Oliver described himself as not engaged in these transactions till circumstances led him to the knowledge of this delegate, and another person known for his having embarked in the treason, and who was now out of the country, but who would have remained in it if the projects had been successful; and the individual in question proposed that Oliver should accompany him to see if he had overstated the matter, and if the people were not prepared to rise. The question was, whether his Majesty's Government, under these circumstances, should not have employed him to go to the country, and endeavour to gain a knowledge of the real state of the case? Would Government have done their duty, if they had not given every encouragement to him to go on that mission, and to endeavour to gain every information which he possibly could? So far from having received instructions for getting up a treason, Mr. Oliver went with letters to certain magistrates, with the view of acting to prevent unnecessary mischief, if there was any danger of an explosion taking place. Mr. Oliver had no means of accrediting himself as Mr. Oliver. When they were told that the treason had been produced by Mr. Oliver, he put it to the House to say in what a state that country must be, in which a stranger on a cursory visit through the country, could dispose it to rebellion (hear! from the Ministerial side)? He had never heard any thing against Mr. Oliver down to the latest moment, and the statement respecting him would not have been produced, if any other circumstance could have been found more useful to the prisoners in the Tower. How could an itinerant, even if disposed, get up such a treason as this? The thing had not been mentioned till it was found that Mr. Oliver was what was called a Government spy, and then the statement was made to serve a particular purpose. Mr. Oliver left the country about the 15th of May, a week before the disturbances in Nottinghamshire; and he did not return till the very night when the meeting at Nottingham took place. On the 22d he left town, and the business must therefore have been settled in his absence, and he could have had no concern whatever with it. It was impossible for Government to say what he might or might not have done in his absence in the country; but the whole of his Reports marked no other purpose than what was necessary in acting the character he had assumed. If he had gone down and made his own way with the people, that would have been another thing; but he had been carried down by a leading man in the treason, and he had therefore no motive to carry on the course which had been ascribed to him.—It was the opinion of Sir J. Byng that Oliver had prevented the explosion of the 9th of June, and that, to the utmost of his power, he had discouraged the intentions. So far from being the creator of all these meetings, he named one place to Sir J. Byng, and the next day, without his knowledge, it was changed to another place. This was enough, he trusted, to make the House receive the statement which had been made with caution. The conspiracy was in full vigour before Oliver had any thing to do with it. Certainly there was information before the Committee, that Oliver had stated, that there were 70,000 men in London ready to co-operate with the disaffected; but it was also proved that the country delegate, who left London with him, chose also to make the same assertion. This was in the spirit of exaggeration which was the true character of that treason. The same character prevailed in the Irish treason, and in every treason that he had heard of. The fact was, that Oliver, when pressed upon these subjects, corroborated the opinion of the other delegate. As to the share which the Government had in these transactions:—two persons would have been sent in the character of delegates to the country; this had been agreed to between the delegate from the country and the person with whom he communicated. If the Government had not agreed that Oliver should go, another would have gone in his stead, with this difference, that he would not have communicated with the Government, and the country would ere now have been deluged with blood. An imputation had been attempted to be thrown on the Administration for the employment of such persons. For himself he should not feel justified in taking a part in any Government which should be prevented from adopting the means of obtaining knowledge of a rebellion before it break out into open acts. The law held a different language, and imposed on the Ministers as a duty, those precautionary steps; it entrusted them with the disposal of considerable sums of money to pay for detecting treasonable conspiracies or other projects against the peace and welfare of the country, without requiring any account of the manner in which it was used, or establishing any safeguard for its proper application, but the oath of the Minister that he had employed it to the best of his discretion in the public service. He allowed, that in a court of justice, or when the persons apprehended on the authority of spies were put on their trial, it was proper that the testimony of such persons should be received with due caution, and that those against whom they appeared should have all the guards that a salutary jealousy of the witness could give them; but to mix up the character of all persons employed in a necessary service of Government in one indiscriminate mass of infamy, and to hold them all equally up to the suspicion and obloquy of the world, was not just towards them, and might be mischievous towards the State. Many persons might engage in criminal projects or enter on the dangerous ground of treason, who had too much principle or too little audacity to proceed all the lengths contemplated by their associates, and who, therefore, when they repented, would be enabled to give the best information; but if the present system of denouncing them to public acorn and infamy was persisted in, these persons would rather have motives to proceed in their criminal career, than inducements to retrace their steps, and would be discouraged from giving information that might repair their errors, by the dread of losing their characters. None but the lowest and most discreditable of mankind would be found to come forward to disclose what they knew, if the character of a witness was to be run down, or his situation rendered dangerous and disreputable, merely because he gave evidence that might be useful for the stability of Government or the preservation of the public peace.—He had now gone over some of the grounds that rendered the bill necessary; but before he moved its first reading, he thought it his duty to state, that the majority of the persons intrusted with the execution of the laws, and most interested in the preservation of the public peace, had given their opinions in favour of the measure, and had expressed their belief, that it had contributed more than any thing else to check and control the treasonable designs of the disaffected. The magistrates of Manchester, and of the other disturbed districts, had, in particular, made such representation. It acted, as it was intended and ought to act, by way of prevention, and by inspiring a salutary apprehension into the delegates of disorder, who knew to what they were exposing themselves if they persevered in their plans of mischief. Parliament had, therefore, now more reason for adopting this measure than when it was last proposed, as it had the experience of success, and the opinion of magistrates in its favour, while at the same time the mischief it was intended to guard against still continued too strong for the ordinary course of the law, and required this salutary restraint. The country could not all at once be restored to tranquillity: but we had now a practical proof that this measure would be efficacious in hastening that desirable event, while the prudence and discretion with which Ministers had already used the powers which it conferred, tended to allay all fears with regard to their future application.—He moved the first reading of the bill to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

Mr. Ponsonby rose. He said, he was anxious to seize the first opportunity to state facts, which, as a member of the Committee, had come to his knowledge, and which he thought ought to be sufficient to prevent the House from adopting a measure as vicious in its principle as it must be mischievous in its effects. As he was about to disclose information which he had gained in the Committee, and was uncertain how far he was restrained by the seal of secrecy, he begged that he might be stopped when he was thought proceeding to an indiscreet length, or was considered as producing a false impression. He would begin with the conduct and transactions of an individual who had occupied a great part of the noble lord's speech, and whose character had become notorious to the country. If he (Mr. P.) were to state that Mr. Oliver had excited the disaffection that prevailed, that he had formed the plots and arranged the insurrections which were described in the Report, and that no design to disturb the peace of the country had been entered into till he left London to go to the agitated districts, he should be stating what was not consistent with fact, and what he did not believe. (Hear, hear, from the Ministerial benches.) He believed that insurrectionary movements were contemplated before this individual began his labours, or received his commission, and that he had predecessors in the course which he pursued. (Loud cries of hear from the Opposition.) He did not know who those individuals were; he did not know their names or characters: the only person on whose authority he could rely was that of the person himself so often alluded to. It was true, there had been dangerous movements in some of the disturbed districts, but who were the agents or agitators the Committee had not learned. These movements were not of recent date. He begged to state to the House, that in those counties there existed an association more atrocious, malignant, and bloody, than any that had ever before disgraced this country, or braved its laws: but that this association had not originated in political principles, and did not direct its view to political objects. The House would anticipate that he meant Luddism or Ludditism. It had commenced several years ago, it still continued in full vigour, and some of the most atrocious suggestions for the disturbance of the public peace, or the commission of cruelty and bloodshed, proceeded, he believed, from individuals trained to mischief by its laws. That they might have mixed themselves with those who had political objects in view, he was not disposed to doubt; but he believed that the great mass of the people never intended disturbance, or were disposed to engage in any criminal proceedings. He was convinced that these people met for the purposes of Reform, and that they formed themselves into numerous associations, merely because they thought that was the only means of obtaining their object. Though he believed them innocent of any criminal intention, he could not say the same of all their leaders, many of whom entertained, he had no depth, very designs. He begged it, however, to be remembered, that in any observations which he made he was speaking with no personal knowledge, and from no investigation of evidence on both sides, but merely from documents of no other labour than that of connecting them together, so as to gain a knowledge of their contents. He had given the Report his sanction because it was agreeable to that evidence, but in no other way was he responsible for its contents. (Hear.) He would state, under the correction to which he had formerly appealed, some of the information gained from the papers and evidence presented to the Committee. It happened that in the month of March last, a person calling himself a delegate, came to town from one of the midland districts, and was introduced to a person of similar opinions in London. The object of his visit was to inform the people in London of the situation of the country, and to carry back to the country the degree of assistance which in any movement in the north might be expected from the metropolis. He told here that the people in the country laboured under an intolerable load of distress, and were excited to great disaffection; that they were unable longer to bear their sufferings, and were determined to throw off the yoke: that they merely wanted to know what aid they could expect from their friends in London, and were anxious to learn the public feeling here. The person to whom this delegate addressed himself gave only discouraging information; expressed great dissatisfaction with the state of the public feeling; and told him that, in consequence of the present situation of affairs, he was about to leave London, and even England; a purpose which he carried into execution soon after. This delegate, however, found two other persons ready to accompany him as delegates from London, to inform the country of the feeling of the capital, and Oliver proposed to go along with them, making a fourth delegate. They soon afterwards left London; but before they proceeded on their journey, Oliver applied at the office of the Home Secretary for permission to go to the disturbed districts, to examine appearances, and to transmit such information for the use of Government as he might obtain. He (Mr. P.) thought it only justice to the noble lord at the head of that department to say, that he gave no authority to Oliver to commit such acts as he had been stated to have committed, or to compromise the safety of any by tempting them into practices which he afterwards exposed. (Hear, hear.) The country delegate placed full reliance on the zeal and sincerity of Oliver. He introduced him to all his friends in the country; he told them that they might place implicit confidence in him, that he was a second self, that nothing which they could disclose to him would be misplaced. Oliver was afterwards received by these people with that confidence which became such a recommendation; he was called the London delegate, was acknowledged and treated in that character, and acquired all the confidence and influence which his high commission conveyed or inspired. He remained among these people a month, from the 17th of April to the 17th of May. He (Mr. P.) could not tell how he comported himself at that epoch; but he was every where received as the London delegate. The account which he gave of his transactions was the following:—The people in the country often asked him how the people in London were disposed? To this he was shy of returning an answer, and sparing of information when he did. He told them that he came to learn the situation of the country, to convey intelligence to the capital, and not to inform the country of what was doing in the capital; that London was ready to rise, and only wished to know what assistance could be derived from the country; and that the people in London would not stir first, but would be ready to second any movement from the country. His friend, and as he might call him his constituent, the country delegate, gave effect to this information, by telling his brethren, the country delegates, that 75,000 individuals could be relied on in the eastern parts of the capital, and 75,000 in the western, making in all 150,000 men. At any rate, he assured them, that there could be no doubt that all who attended Spasfields were zealous reformers, and these amounted to 70,000 men. Could it be denied, that a person communicating such reports as this would not do mischief? Must not the effect of his conduct necessarily be to excite the wretched individuals with whom he conversed to acts of rebellion or insubordination, by assuring them of the certainty of a relief to their distress by means of a revolution which, there was no doubt, they could produce, by merely giving the signal to an irresistible force which would follow in their train, and be guided by their example? (Hear, hear, hear.) Without bringing any accusation against Government, who employed Oliver, he would ask, must not this have been the natural result of his conduct? Could any thing be more calculated to encourage criminal hopes, or to lead to desperate enterprises? Yet the information which Oliver gave to the Committee was calculated to destroy any belief that might exist of a correspondence, or an understanding between the disaffected in London and the country. He (Mr. P.) asked that individual, if, when he thus encouraged the country delegates with hopes of assistance from the capital, he knew of any society or association established in London for the purpose of corresponding or co-operating with any society or association in the country, or if he had ever seen traces of such correspondence? and he answered that he neither knew nor had known of any such society. "I next asked him," said the hon. gentleman, "if he knew or had known of any gentleman or man of rank, wealth, character, or influence in London, with whom the disaffected in the country were correspondence, on whom they relied for assistance, or whom they regarded as favourable to their designs?" and he answered, "I neither now know nor have I known such a person." "I then asked if the person who accompanied him to the country, ever mentioned the name of any individual whom the country meetings or delegates had selected in London as the channel of communication between any body of disaffected men in the metropolis, and the districts which he traversed?" and he answered "that the delegate never named such a person or spoke of such a proceeding." (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. P.) mentioned these things, not to criminate Government for what they had done, but to shew that if no society existed in the metropolis to correspond with the disaffected, if no man of rank, wealth, influence, or character, was implicated in their designs, or favoured their projects, if the disturbances were confined to districts of the country where there were so many causes of excitement, besides political, our liberties ought not to be suspended. (Hear, hear.) He allowed that disaffection existed in the manufacturing districts, but was this a reason for depriving the whole of the country of the benefits of the Constitution? The Suspension of the Habeas Corpus was neither necessary nor was it adapted to the evil. A local evil required a more particular legislation. It was the duty of the House to apply a remedy to the evil complained of, which was daily growing more inveterate. There could otherwise be no hopes of tranquillity. It was not by suspending our liberties that tranquillity could be restored, but by destroying this system of outrage and atrocity, supported by an association who had wrought their minds to such a pitch of rancorous and cruel malignity, that they would shoot any person for a few shillings who never did them any injury, and who was perfectly inoffensive: unless this system could be rooted out, in vain would any attempt be made to restore the peace of the country, or to retrieve England from a stain which was now cast on her for the first time by the atrocious conduct of Englishmen who hired themselves to murder their unoffending fellow-subjects. (Loud cries of hear.) A measure like that now proposed, instead of putting down the evil, would increase it, by teaching the more respectable part of the nation to be dissatisfied with that Constitution which was no longer worthy of their attachment, and that Government which robbed them of their liberty. How could the present measure repress the efforts of these people? Would a few months' imprisonment care them? Would it deprive them of their malignity? After suffering a few months' captivity, would not they be turned out to disturb the world? It was not his duty to propose a remedy, but he would say, that penalties must be enacted against those desperate associations. He would recommend an inquiry into this subject; he would recommend it as a good thing for the districts infestes with these banditti; for the honour of the nation; and above all, for the purpose of destroying that pretence for the Suspension of the Constitution which was now resorted to. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Legh, Esq. said, the people in the disturbed districts knew no other remedy against the Luddites than the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. The magistrates had endeavoured, without success, to put down these associations by the ordinary powers of the law; though a more active body of magistrates no where else existed (hear, hear, hear): their whole time and exertions were spent in preserving the public peace, and even their lives were exposed in the performance of their duty; yet all their attempts had failed. The evil had fixed its roots so deep, that as long as free agency was allowed to the leaders of these associations, it was not in the power of man to put them down. (Loud cries of hear.) He knew of one of the leaders now in custody, though he had heard of others; and he thought it would be dangerous to let them immediately loose on society. (Hear, hear.) The usual powers of the law were useless; there was but one opinion on this subject in that part of the country to which he belonged. If any gentleman knew a better remedy than the present, let him propose it, and the magistrates would willingly adopt it. With respect to Oliver, it would be found that his case had been greatly misrepresented. His character stood higher than that of the class of men to which he was generally described as belonging. Against his moral character there was no imputation. (Shouts of hear, from the Opposition, re-echoed by the Ministerial benches.) Without such agents the designs of the disaffected could not be counteracted. He was glad that this subject had been brought before the House, as the magistrates, since the publications about Oliver, had not known how to act. Sir J. Byng's letter was however sufficient before to remove all scruples. (Shouts of hear from the Opposition.) At the last midland assizes, the magistracy of the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Leicester, were so sensible of the extent of the prevailing disorders, that they recommended the renewal of the frame-breaking bill, with the re-enactment of the capital part of it. The secrecy, however, and spirit of co-operation with which the proceedings of the Luddites were carried on, rendered every measure short of the power of taking away their leaders, in his opinion, nugatory and ineffectual. (Hear, hear.) Whatever might have been the original object of the Huddenden clubs, he did not scruple to say, that they had become the pest and bane of society. They were instituted ostensibly with a view to advance Reform, but these sinister objects were soon disclosed. Yet the magistracy, who had always a cautious eye upon those clubs, sought in vain to detect their delinquency. (A laugh, and hear, hear, on the Opposition benches.) The magistrates could not, indeed, bring home conviction to any member of those clubs. But the Luddites could not so contrive to escape detection, as they had not equal art, and therefore six of them were executed after the last Assizes for Leicester.

Mr. Abercromby observed, that the existence of considerable danger was admitted on all sides, and the only question for discussion was, whether such a bill as that before them could encourage any rational expectation of its proving a successful remedy for the evil. The opinions of the hon. gentleman who spoke last were, from his experience and knowledge of that part of the country which was most disturbed, peculiarly entitled to attention; but he was sorry to say, he had never heard a less convincing speech than that of the hon. gentleman. It was made up of statements which rested entirely on his own assertion, or of reasonings which directly controverted those statements. (Hear, hear.) How was it that the hon. gentleman pronounced the present to be the only effectual legislative proceeding applicable to the case in question, when he himself had informed the House that the grand juries of Derby, Nottingham and Leicester, whilst this very measure was in existence, found it so ineffectual that they recommended the renewal of a local act passed in 1812, and since suffered to expire? (Hear.) The hon. gentleman had expressed his satisfaction that the case of Oliver had been brought forward, and had stated his conviction that nothing could be proved against the moral character of that individual. It surprised him much, that any hon. member should deem it necessary to enter into a vindication of so strange a species of morality—a morality which led the party to introduce himself to the confidence of persons resident in the country, by flattering their prejudices, instigating their zeal, and inflaming them to acts of sedition; by assuring them that 75 or 70,000 men in London waited for no other inducement to insurrection, than the indication of the same spirit in other parts of the country. Such was the morality of the man employed by his Majesty's Ministers to sound the dispositions of the people by mischievous suggestions supported by false statements; and to his judgment it certainly appeared, that those whose object it was to prevent mischief would have pursued a conduct just the reverse of this. (Hear, hear.) The House were bound also to consider into whose hands they were about to commit so great a power. There never was a time when so many constitutional questions were pending, with respect to the conduct of a Minister, as were now raised with respect to the conduct of Lord Sidmouth. The Government might appeal to their majorities in Parliament; but who was there who had heard the discussions on the subject of the prisoners confined in Reading gaol, or the circular letter to the magistracy, founded on the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and lastly, on the extraordinary mission of Mr. Oliver, who would not say, that a strong case presented itself against any reliance on the discretion of a Minister whose proceedings had in those instances been impeached; and, he believed, condemned by a large majority of the country? From all the evidence of which the House was in possession, the inference was, that the disorder was local; that it had no communication with London; and that with regard to its capacity of subverting the Government, nothing could be more futile or contemptible. The Luddites, it was true, were extremely well organized for the purposes they had in view, but these were very different from any political object, or design of overturning the State. Their means, as instrumental to the prosecution of such a design, were utterly contemptible. There was, indeed, no example of a great State, supported by property, by a gradation of ranks, and enjoying a free Constitution, overthrown by a general conspiracy of the lower orders. If the people had powerful or formidable leaders of their own, how came Oliver to acquire such sudden influence among them? It was ridiculous to imagine that any association of individuals, not one of whom was worth 20*l.*, could be really dangerous to the security of the Government. The removal of Oliver would do no good so long as the system was maintained; and new Olivers would appear every day; there never would be any want of persons of his description. What he would recommend to the House would be the enactment of a code of laws referring precisely to the nature and extent of the evil, and the rigorous enforcement of them when enacted. Our ancestors, when they passed the statute of treasons, never thought of constructive treasons; they contemplated a real conspiracy against the King's life, or an actual levying of war against him, and so strong was this feeling in the country, that so long as the disaffected were brought to trial in this form, he believed the Crown would obtain no convictions. (Hear, hear.) Let, then, laws be passed, if the present were ineffectual, applicable to the existing evil. So far from thinking a continued Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act a measure of that nature, he apprehended that it would only serve to alienate the affections of the public, and to render the conviction of offenders more rare and difficult. The consequence must be, that Ministers would be glad to avail themselves of any plot as a pretext or ground for the farther continuance of this measure. (Hear, hear.) In every former case of a suspension of the law, the sentiment of the people had gone with it, but the compendious argument which, after being so often applied to their pockets, was now applied to their liberties, that they must surrender a part to preserve the rest, gave no satisfaction under the present circumstances of the country.

Mr. Legh Keck explained, and declared that Mr. Oliver had been in danger of his life at Nottingham.

Mr. Barclay was of opinion, that the noble lord, in looking at the extent of the evil, had forgotten the remedy already in his hands. Whilst he magnified the danger, he diminished the strength of those laws which had been provided against it. The plans of insurrection which had been disclosed, proved that the parties had no certain knowledge or just calculation of their own force. He could not consent therefore to sacrifice one of his dearest liberties upon vague apprehensions and futile dangers. He could not forget that 200 men had marched through the city without finding any addition to their numbers. The magistrates would be encouraged to act with tenfold vigour, now that they perceived with how few of the disaffected they had to contend. The present circumstances were very different from those under which this measure was before brought forward. Parliament was then sitting, and if any instance of an abuse of authority occurred, it was sure to be represented to that House. The employment of spies and informers he considered necessary; but it was obvious that the trust reposed in them might be easily perverted to injurious purposes. As the representative of a large body of his fellow-countrymen, he could not, although he believed Ministers had no sinister purposes in view, support such a measure upon the grounds alleged, and during the recess of Parliament. The country was in a course of improvement, labour was again beginning to find employment, agriculture was recovering, and that severe distress, which it was only wonderful had not still more exposed them to the instigations of the disaffected, would soon, he trusted, disappear, and banish all those violent symptoms which were supposed to render so extraordinary a measure as the present necessary.

Mr. Wilberforce declared, that he should always feel a strong reluctance to sacrifice so important a privilege as that which it was now proposed to suspend; and if he consented on this occasion to invest his Majesty's Ministers with such a power, it was because he concurred with them that they had the best means of judging that it was necessary to the safety of the country. He thought that, in the late disturbances all over the country there was much more of a political character than had been represented by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby.) If the leaders were without property, they were not without great natural energy. (Hear, hear.) Those preachers of seditious doctrines, who went about among the multitude, unhappily too well disposed to receive their lessons, infusing their poison where they saw it most likely to be effectual, and converting unavoidable sufferings into motives to insurrection and rebellion, were unquestionably among the most pernicious members of society. He could readily conceive how the lower orders, that valuable portion of the community, whose labour was so essential to the social system under which we lived, might be tempted by the delusive and wicked principles instilled into their minds, to direct their strength to the destruction of the Government, and to the overthrow of every civil and religious establishment. It did not appear that Oliver had asserted, when he mentioned in round numbers the force of the disaffected in London, that there existed any general committee, or that there was any precise calculation formed upon that subject; but surely nobody would deny that there was a great deal of disaffection in London, which, although in consequence of this measure it might hide its head for a while, only waited for the first favourable opportunity. (Hear, hear, hear.) How was the circumstance, so fully attested, of the number who in many populous districts in the country daily watched the arrival of the mail, in the expectation of hearing that the Tower and the Bank were in the hands of insurgents, to be explained, except as the indication of a belief, that the rising in one place would be the signal for a rising in others? He believed this disposition was created, not by the spirit of Luddism with all its dreadful system of secrecy, and tendency to mischief, but by the dangerous political doctrines which had been propagated. He begged to refer them to the first Report: in that they would find that the Committee entertained this opinion, and that they took the same view, both as to the extent and malignity of the disease. The question then was, whether this was an appropriate remedy. Strictly speaking it was not, for the object was to take away those who infused the poison, whilst the complete remedy could only be expected from that alternative system which must be brought about by a more general diffusion of knowledge and moral principles. With regard to the possibility of its abuse, he believed that the best affected, and the most respectable, entertained the smallest fears. (Hear, hear.) He could not easily bring himself to apprehend that the noble lord (Sidmouth) would so far forget the character which he had always sustained, as to employ the authority intrusted to him to wicked or oppressive purposes. (Hear, hear.) He hardly thought it fair to indulge in representations of this nature. Although Parliament might not be sitting, no case of cruelty or hardship could remain unknown in the present state of the press, and every such case would most certainly be canvassed whenever Parliament should be re-assembled. Candidly speaking, however, did any honourable gentleman believe that such abuses were likely to take place? He admitted that all power had a tendency towards excess; but in this country that tendency was corrected by various controlling causes. If such instances of abuse had already occurred, the blame attending them was not imputable to his Majesty's Ministers, nor did they afford any ground for believing that they had been actuated by any other intention than that of discharging their duty. It was often the accident of human affairs, that nothing was left but a choice of evil, and such he conceived to be now the case with Ministers. (Hear, from the Treasury Bench.) He confessed that when he saw the designs of those who, whatever the world might think of them, were yet wise in their generation, and when Ministers pledged themselves that this measure was necessary, he felt himself, however reluctant, compelled to yield to such necessity. He certainly thought it an evil; at the same time he hoped that the natural good sense of the people of England would at length restore them to their suspended rights. Till then he must, for the sake of the patient poor, for the sake even of the turbulent themselves, consent to the passing of the bill now proposed. (Hear, from the Treasury bench.)

Lord Althorpe said, the main reason for passing this bill, was the danger alleged to exist; but when he looked about, it was somewhat difficult to discover that danger. The proceedings disclosed at the late trial, shewed the absurdity of apprehending any serious mischief. He denied that the acquiescence in the first Report made it necessary to agree with the second; for many fresh circumstances had arisen which proved the utter want of foundation of much of the alarm contained in that first Report; and certainly where so much had been found to be groundless, he was not at all disposed to give that implicit confidence to Ministers of which the last hon. gentleman had spoken so much, whose doctrine went at once to destroy the best safeguards of the British Constitution. (Hear.) Comparing the alleged objects of the conspirators with their acknowledged means, he felt that the actual danger was a mere trifle. It was pretended, among other things, that it was their intention to burn the town of Manchester to the ground. The idea was certainly horrible; but when it was considered that the persons accused of such a design were precisely the persons who would be ruined by the execution of it, he confessed that he felt more than a doubt as to its probability. It was impossible to expect such a result from such persons; and he did not think that a man in that House could lay his hand upon his heart and say that he seriously believed it. (Hear.) Some gentlemen talked a great deal about the Constitution which had been transmitted to us by our ancestors; but he felt assured, that they could set very little value on it, since they attempted to cut asunder its best safeguards, at the very moment that they were decaying on its excellence and stability. As to any genuine regard for the Constitution, it was sufficient to mention, that though a most dangerous conspiracy was asserted to have existed for eight months, and within the perfect knowledge of Ministers, yet not one individual had yet been convicted of any crime against the State. It would have been much better to have brought some of the conspirators to justice than to have suspended the rights of the whole people. Nothing of this sort had been done; and even with respect to those persons who had been arrested, they might all have been apprehended under the usual laws, without having recourse to the present odious measure. (Hear, hear.)

Sir S. Romilly observed, that the noble lord (Castlereagh) had assumed that all those who agreed with the first Report ought to support the second. He did not see any soundness in this observation; though he was ready to aver that he should vote for the present bill, if he did not in his conscience believe that it was an inadequate remedy for the existing evil, and even aggravated the very mischief which it was designed to prevent; but even allowing that the former bill was necessary, the present bill was by no means in the same situation. The question was much more important now than it was at the beginning of the session. Though the House then took away the most important right of the subject, yet the suspension was for a limited period, and Parliament were expressly enabled to revise or revoke it. But now it was proposed to take away this right during a time when there would be no safeguard, no security for its restoration. The duration of the suspension was indefinite, for how could it be determined when the next Parliament was to meet—whether in December, February, or March next. This rested entirely in the breasts of Ministers; and so repugnant to the spirit of liberty did he think such a power, that, if the bill should be carried, it was his intention to move that some fixed time should be named, at which Ministers should be compelled to convoke the Parliament. The noble lord had talked of circumstances of augmented danger; if such were the case, what did it prove, except that not only was the suspension bill inefficient, but that treason had grown up under it, instead of being crushed? And; indeed, could any one doubt that it must furnish food for discontent and disaffection? Before the passing of this bill, the grievances complained of by the people might in some sense be said to be imaginary. They had some remote notion that every thing was not precisely as it was in the reign of King John. (A laugh.) But now it was very different: there was a positive and present evil to complain of; an evil no less than the possibility of the privation of personal liberty, and that without notice and without trial. (Hear.) There was also another evil no less grievous. It was now for the first time avowed, that spies were in the regular pay of Ministers, and were part of the cruel system of Administration. Surely, here was enough to excite discontent and disgust through the House and the nation. (Cheering.) It was impossible now not to feel that the last Report, of course unintentionally, had been in many respects grossly exaggerated; and was there a man who could doubt that if the Committee had seen the examination of certain witnesses, they would never have made so strong a Report. (Hear, hear.) It was a most striking feature in this case, that though these treasonable practices were said to have comunned so long, and though the Quarter Sessions and the Assizes had been since held in the disturbed districts, yet nobody had been brought to trial. Government indeed had studiously avoided bringing the matter into any train of open examination. Though 140 persons had been arrested in the neighbourhood of Manchester alone, and though some of them were indicted, yet rather than bring them to trial, Government had sent down a certiorari, in order to prevent immediate investigation. How was this to be accounted for? How was it that, where there was an opportunity of making that example which of course Ministers must consider as the most salutary, yet they did all in their power to put off that result which they ought to consider as the most desirable? How was this to be explained, except on the supposition that they felt that investigation would do more harm than good to the object which they had in view. (Hear.) There was another circumstance well worthy of notice, which was, that notwithstanding the parade that had been made in the first Report respecting seditious libels, yet not one person had been brought to trial except for an offence which had been created by the very suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Thus the measure had produced the very result which it pretended to remedy. (The hon. and learned member alluded to the case of Mr. Wooler, on which a debate arose on the 26th instant.) Looking at the last Report, he found more than one passage corroborative of this position, that the act had rather increased than diminished the evil so much complained of. The Report in one place stated, that "it appears to the Committee, that the utmost confidence prevailed among the delegates as to the ultimate attainment of their objects; that the successive arrests of several of the principal leaders, though they occasioned a momentary disappointment, did not extinguish the spirit of insurrection, or the hopes of success, in the parts of the country above mentioned; and the utmost impatience was manifested at the delays which had taken place in fixing the day for the general rising." (Hear, hear.) Another passage was still stronger—"Your Committee cannot contemplate what has passed in the country, even since the date of their former Report, without the most serious apprehension. During this period, the precautionary measures adopted by Parliament have been in force; many of the most active promoters of public disturbance have been apprehended: the immediate projects of the disaffected have been discovered and deranged; yet nothing has deterred them from a steady pursuit of their ultimate object." (Hear, hear.) What did this prove, except that no permanent good could be expected from these boasted measures of repression? It was somewhat curious, that when Ministers were already armed with the power of transporting any of these delegates who might be found offending, yet they carefully shunned what might be a useful example, and preferred locking them up in obscurity, so that not even their names could escape to warn their followers, or deter their followers. (Hear, hear.) And that their punishment was at once odious and useless. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member for Leicester (Mr. L. Keck) had intimated that this measure was necessary for the repression of Luddism. He (Sir S. R.) deprecated this idea, and conjured the House not to entertain it for a moment; for if it was once to be allowed that the suspension of the rights of the whole people was the only effective remedy for Luddism, he feared that the consequence would be, that the Suspension Act might last, not for six weeks or for six months, but for six years, or for sixty; for he thought that Luddism was not likely ever to be eradicated by such a proceeding, or within so short a time as some gentlemen contemplated. The Report seemed to acquit London from the charge of any connexion with the disaffected; at least it stated, in a very ambiguous manner, that the Committee had obtained no specific information of any body of men associated in the metropolis with whom the disaffected in the country appeared to be acting in concert. This ought to induce his hon. friend (Mr. Wilberforce) to regard the spirit, of which he was afraid, as less extensive and powerful than he had supposed it to be. He must confess, too, that after the petitions which had been laid on the table, stating instances of great oppression under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and particularly one which had been laid on the table that evening, and which related to a case of uncommon severity, he could not but be surprised how his hon. friend, with the knowledge he possessed of these facts, could still believe that none but the disaffected entertained apprehensions on the subject of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. He well knew the humane disposition of his hon. friend, who, he was convinced, could not have looked into the circumstances and situation of the country with his usual attention when he delivered this opinion. The kindness of his hon. friend to him would not permit him to suppose that he ranked him among the disaffected, though he frankly avowed that he was one of those persons who entertained most serious apprehensions from the passing of this measure. It gave to Ministers a power most dangerous to the Constitution, and he cared not in whose hands that power might be placed. It was one of the melancholy signs of the times, that while day after day encroachments were made on public liberty, the answer to every complaint was, that the power which was given would be placed in gentle hands. Was there ever any despotic government which did not claim the right of exercising power on this ground? It was the interest of every sort of government to govern well; and when the most despotic enforced mischievous measures, it often proceeded more from ignorance or want of judgment than intention; but the only real security for the governed was that responsibility of the Government which it was the object of this measure to remove. He saw, besides, no particular reason for satisfaction at the hands in which this monstrous power was now to be placed. The private character of the noble lord on whom the powers would devolve, he was sensible, was meritorious and praiseworthy, but he was not on that account bound to entertain respect for him as a public man. He could not reconcile himself to so light a way of speaking of the Constitution as that which made the suspension of its most valuable privileges a matter of indifference, because certain persons, of whom a favourable opinion was entertained, were to be invested with the arbitrary authority which must be the consequence of that suspension. He could not, however, so readily join in that favourable view of the mode in which that authority was likely to be exercised, when he recollected that it was placed in the same hands that vindicated the violation of the statute for the protection of prisoners. It was no slight objection to the bill that it was made to extend to Scotland, though the Report afforded no ground for that extension. He would ask whether it was possible to point out a sentence in the Report which could afford a pretext for depriving Scotland of the protection of the act against "wrongous imprisonment." He could state that the disposition of the people of Scotland was most orderly and loyal; and this he could do, not upon vague and uncertain evidence, but upon the best authority. He alluded to the address lately voted by the general assembly of the Church of Scotland to the Prince Regent. That address came from a body of the clergy, who did not, as was unfortunately too often the case in England, live absent from their charge, but who were always resident in their respective parishes, and intimately acquainted with the opinions and situations of their flocks. The address described the people as enduring the distress and difficulties which they had to encounter with the greatest firmness, tranquillity, and patience, and "congratulated his Royal Highness, that neither privations nor the corrupting influence of inflammatory language employed by seditious persons had been able to seduce the people from their principles of loyalty and allegiance." He must contend, therefore, that the people of Scotland were completely acquitted of any charge of disaffection. Why then were they threatened with the suspension of that act, which was justly regarded as the Magna Charta of that country? He was afraid, however, that he must anticipate the passing of this measure; for could any body doubt that that House of Commons which had not thought fit to call upon Ministers to produce the names of the persons whom they had already immured in dungeons, would refuse to grant a continuance of the power which they had thus sanctioned? It had been asked by some, what was the difference between the present mode of proceeding, and the bringing the persons to trial in the ordinary way? The great difference was that, under the present system, individuals might be carried off from their homes and imprisoned in dungeons, without any of their friends knowing where they were to be found. His honourable friend supposed that such transactions could not take place without being soon inquired into, and that any act of oppression must speedily come to the knowledge of the public. That would indeed be true, with individuals of distinction like his hon. friend, or persons of any consequence, but who would inquire after unfortunate journeymen shoemakers or weavers? The obscurity of these persons rendered them liable to the greatest oppression. He did not know whether his hon. friend had been in the House when a petition was presented from an individual who had been detained seven years in close custody. There were many such cases, and the parties, though no charge had been brought against them, were ultimately shut out from all means of obtaining redress. It was said that Ministers had no interest in possessing themselves of this extraordinary power: on this point the public were not exactly of the same opinion with some members of that House. The public in general were satisfied that the session has passed over in a very different manner from what it would have done, had it not been for the introduction of these arbitrary measures. An opinion prevailed very extensively in the country that the noble lord and his colleagues had in some degree been obliged to the alarm they had raised for maintaining them in their situations: for what questions of economy or reduction of expenditure could be attended to when measures of such magnitude were forced upon Parliament? He was sorry to say that he looked with dismay to the situation of the country: he saw in it two great parties strongly opposed to each other: one actually devoted to the Ministers of the day; the other calling itself no party, but most active and industrious in promoting its views: those two parties were playing into each other's hands; the one disgusting by its violence, and the other, the Government, doing still more mischief by provoking that violence. A principal part of the system of the one was to take away the confidence of the people in public men; and he was sorry to say that the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers tended most directly to promote the same object; for whenever any thing blameable was urged against them, they did not attempt any defence of the transaction itself, but endeavoured to find out that something as bad had been done by others. The consequence was, that the people were left without any persons to look up to except temporary adventurers. Such was the lamentable situation to which the country was brought. If any political concussion should take place, this want of confidence in public men would be attended with most awful consequences; and for this dreadful state of things the noble lord who now spoke so much of the disorders of the country, was himself of all men most deeply responsible.

Mr. Wilberforce explained.

Mr. Banks supported the bill. He said, he was fully convinced of its necessity, and had no fears that the powers it conveyed would be misused by the noble lord in whom they would be invested. They had no reason to doubt the regard of that noble lord for the Constitution, who, when he sat in the chair of that House, had shewn so much knowledge of the Constitution, and so strong an attachment to its principles. But the character of that noble lord was not the only reason for his giving his consent to the measure. He was prepared to justify it on the ground of its necessity. He was satisfied that no other remedy could be applied to the existing situation of the country; and the circumstance of Parliament being about to rise was, in his opinion, an additional reason for passing the bill, as the country ought not to be left unprotected during the period of the prorogation. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby) had said that the greatest danger was to be apprehended from the spirit of Luddism, and that the Government ought to direct their attention to put it down. If the right hon. gentleman had any measure to propose for that purpose, he should be glad to consider it; but whatever it was, it was not in his opinion probable that it would render the present bill unnecessary. It was said that the conspirators were not dangerous, because there were no persons of consequence among them. It appeared to him, however, that they were the more dangerous on that very account. When persons of distinction are engaged in plots, if the heads be seized the whole business is over: but such was not the case with insurrections of the present description; for one head was no sooner seized than another Hydra started up. The most dangerous systems, those which had most agitated and disturbed the world, had commenced in the way in which these insurrections had taken their origin. This would be evident from a reference to history, and particularly to the history of this country and France. Nothing was more fallacious than to say that these men could never rise to a head, because they wanted a head. A most dangerous spirit had gone abroad, and he believed that the well disposed part of the country would be very sorry to see Parliament rise without passing the bill now before the House.

Lord Milton opposed the motion for the first reading of this bill, because he considered it a measure altogether uncalled for. This he said without regard to the hands in which the power which the bill would give was to be placed, notwithstanding the eulogies which had been pronounced on the noble lord at the head of the Home Department. Those eulogies could not justify the measure; and some of them were the more remarkable in coming from the same person who had argued that the prorogation of Parliament was a reason for adopting the proposed measure. That certainly was not a very convincing nor a very parliamentary mode of reasoning. He hoped, however, that when the bill came to a Committee, if it should proceed so far, that the hon. gentleman who had delivered this sentiment would agree with him to limit the duration of the bill to the Autumn, because by doing so he would secure the meeting of Parliament, and thereby remove the necessity for a measure which all must lament. He was against the bill, not only because it was an infraction of the Constitution, but because it was not applicable as a remedy for the evil complained of; for if it had been a remedy, the cure ought to have been completed before now. When he last opposed this measure, he had done it with a trembling hand and an aching heart. (See p. 355.) It was the only time he had ever had the misfortune to differ from one to whose opinions all his respect was due, and he had given his vote with great pain; but with what satisfaction did he give it now, knowing that that difference which then made him regret the course he was taking was removed. He opposed this bill with as much joy and satisfaction as he had the former with regret and sorrow; for he had now the happiness of concurring with him from whom he had never differed on any other occasion, and hoped he never should differ again. (Hear, hear.) An hon. friend had stated that all the civil and military authorities in the disturbed districts were for the bill. He could tell him of one who now entertained a different opinion, and one whose opinion he believed his hon. friend was inclined to respect. That person had made a strict investigation into the situation of those parts of the country; and the result was, that he was perfectly satisfied that there was no ground for the present measure. Such was the opinion of one who, of all the persons in this country, was perhaps more particularly liable to be termed an alarmist. What was now proposed to be done? They were going to prolong a bill in a manner for which there was no precedent. If there was nothing to support the measure in point of precedent, there was still less to be said in its defence, on the ground of the hands to which the authority was to be intrusted. The love of power was predominant in the human mind, and there was no reason to suppose that the noble Secretary of State for the Home Department was divested of that passion. Indeed there had been circumstances in the conduct of that noble Secretary which ought to teach the House to be rather jealous of placing any extraordinary powers in his hands. The House might perhaps recollect a correspondence which had not long since passed between the noble lord and a gentleman of Norwich, who had placed himself at the head of a club called the Brunswick Knights: these Brunswick Knights had a political creed of their own, one of the tenets of which was that Hampden died a enjoy to his country. (Shouts of hear from the Opposition.) Now the noble lord, while he declared his general dislike to political associations, expressed a very favourable opinion of the object of that institution; and this exemption from disapprobation might by some be supposed to throw light on the tendency of that noble lord's mind as to certain political questions. In fact, it was no matter of importance into whose hands the authority was to be placed; for if any man was to be trusted with power, it was natural he should desire more; and he did not believe that the present Ministers were exempt from the operations of this law of nature, which extended from the peasant to the Throne. Speaking of the Throne, in which the passion for power was so generally admitted to exist, he could not refrain from alluding, as an instance in point, to a work lately published. He meant an account of the Life of James II., which, he supposed, most of the members of that House had read. In the appendix to that work there was a very curious document, entitled "King James's Advice to his Son." That advice was known to have been transcribed by the fair hands of a lady in a high station, whose name it would be unparliamentary to mention. That there should be any thing in such advice to delight the eyes of those Princes of the House of Brunswick who were brought to this country to maintain the Habeas Corpus Act, to protect the liberties of the people, and to maintain that very Consitution which King James II. had violated, was most extraordinary. (Hear, hear, hear.) The advice given by King James to his son, which had met with such distinguished approbation, contained a sentiment to this effect—that it was a great misfortune to the people as well as the country, that the Habeas Corpus Act had been passed, as it obliged the Government to maintain a great force, and enabled the turbulent to prosecute their evil designs. This, it was alleged, had been the object of Lord Shaftesbury in promoting the passing of the act. He (Lord M.) had no doubt that, with all thrones, Habeas Corpus Acts were great evils. For this opinion he had the authority of King James; he had also the authority of the Government of France. There had been a struggle in that country in former times, the great object of which was to obtain a constitutional law similar to our Habeas Corpus. The Court of France, however, prevailed, and the history of the succeeding century and a half sufficiently proved what had been the lamentable effects of that success. He had, the other night made some statements which, as a member of the Secret Committee, he had a right to do. He should now take the liberty to notice a passage in the Report. It stated, with respect to the metropolis, that the Committee had received no specific information of any association. He had acceded to that proposition; but he must say, that the thread of evidence on which it was founded was most slender. He would repeat, that throughout the whole proceedings there was a disposition to give a stronger impression to the evidence of disaffection than he thought it fairly bore. On this account he had prepared a paragraph with the view of inserting it in the Report to diminish the effect of that impression. He had also wished to introduce a proposition recommending the bringing the individuals accused to a speedy trial, a measure which was calculated to have the most salutary effect. "This," said the noble lord, "is a bill of attainder against the people of England. Do not tell me of

Kings and good Ministers; that is not proper language for a House of Commons. (Hear, hear.) I know of no Kings, I know of no Ministers, who are not disposed to increase their power (hear, hear): and therefore I say, let us preserve the Habeas Corpus Act. (Loud cheering.) Much, Sir, has been said of the danger arising from seditious and inflammatory publications, and certainly no man can be more ready than I am to vote for the punishment of the authors; but if the Ministers of this country shall persuade country gentlemen that the Habeas Corpus Act is not to be held in religious veneration by the people, they will add much to the dissatisfaction which now prevails. (Hear, hear.) I believe that this act will be administered mildly; so much the worse; because it must tend to create an opinion, that the people of this country can do without the great measure which our ancestors considered the principal security of their liberties. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I confess that I would much rather have this power in the hands of those who would abuse it; (hear, hear, hear, from the Ministerial benches, cheered by the Opposition;) because in that case, the people would be more likely to value their liberties, and to demand the restitution of them. (Hear, hear.) On looking back to the various suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Act, I observe one remarkable circumstance, namely, that each suspension of that law has been carried on less serious facts than the former. (Hear, hear, hear.) Where, then, are we to go? At what point are we to stop? Who is to measure the quantity of danger that shall render this measure necessary? Is every disorder to be cured by this desperate remedy? Sir, I admit that there may be considerable discontent in the country. Great distress exists in all classes of the community, and wherever there is distress there must be also discontent. The one cannot exist without the other, at least in the minds of the lower orders. This distress has arisen, either from the badness of the Government itself, (hear, hear,) or from circumstances which have operated upon persons in every station. Let the Ministers restore prosperity to the country, and we shall hear no more of the risings of the people. It is upon these grounds, Sir, that I think it my duty to vote against the introduction of this bill: I consider it unnecessary and uncalled for by the existing state of things, and I believe it will rather increase than allay the spirit of disaffection which is said to prevail in the country." (Loud cheering.)

Mr. W. Courtenay defended the accuracy of the Report, and supported the bill.

Sir J. Newport observed, that no one had yet convinced him that this measure would remedy the evil which was said to exist. Ministers had already apprehended certain persons whom they had not brought to trial; but would not the speedy trial of those persons have a greater effect in putting down the projects of the discontented than by arresting and detaining in custody a great body of others? The arguments which had been adduced on this occasion were of no greater weight than when this measure was first recommended to the House; and as he thought the danger still less at this moment, he should certainly vote against the bill. It was a very dangerous power to be intrusted to any man, and it was in order to prevent those explosions which had taken place in France, that he besought the House to have that example before their eyes, and to conciliate rather than to inflame the minds of the people. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Elliot said, he would pass by entirely those objections against this measure, that it would be an encroachment on the Constitution, because he was satisfied that no man, no lover of his country, no Englishman, could tolerate such a measure without a conviction of its adequate necessity. (Hear, hear.) Parliament having reserved to itself the power of re-considering the state of the country before its separation, the question turned upon the nature and extent of the danger that existed. It certainly appeared to him, that there was a systematic design to corrupt the lower classes of the people, particularly in the manufacturing districts, which comprised the most efficient part of our population. If Luddism took a favourable turn, it was capable of being converted to the worst of purposes. The peculiar danger which he saw, was in the mind, and temper, and disposition of the people. Who could contemplate the fact of great bodies of people turning their attention to arms and ammunition, without feeling the necessity of adopting precaution? Slight as this mischief might appear to some, it was of a character to associate to itself greater force, and it would work even into higher classes of the community. (Hear, hear, from the Ministerial side.) He knew the argument, that the spirit of disaffection and rebellion was confined to low persons; but he did not know that men of that cast were not peculiarly calculated to effect the object which they had in view. A Government might be overturned and destroyed by people of the lowest rank, though greater abilities were required to recover the scattered elements. No one could doubt that the object of the Manchester expedition was force. The circumstances of that case established the fact of influence: it was a concerted plan, undertaken by demagogues, and intended to be carried into execution by armed men. The demagogues harangued, and the people followed. The people were capable of doing considerable mischief, and were actually doing it; and if we were now to withdraw this measure, we should give them a fresh impulse. Upon the whole, he thought this precaution necessary for the preservation of the lives, the property, and the liberties of the country; and although he lamented exceedingly to have occasion to differ from his old and noble friend (Lord Milton), whose decision, from his superior means of knowing all the evidence, made him reel and stagger when he ventured to express a contrary opinion, yet he found himself bound in conscience to give his assent to the bill, and to express his hope that it would be adopted by the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham said, the question simply was, had the House evidence to prove that this measure was absolutely necessary? Upon that question he said, No. He did not mean to impeach the integrity of the Committee, but men might be mistaken, and it was of the nature of alarms to be infectious. By the second Report it was asserted that the treasonable practices were confined to the country, while the first had insisted that the whole centered in the metropolis—a contradiction of no small importance, because there was a wide difference between an organized plan in the heart of the empire and the seat of Government, and a scattered and uncombined discontent in distant parts of the country. It was not a little curious to contrast what was inserted in the first Report as fact, and as reason for unlimited alarm, and what had now come out to be the truth on the recent trials. The Report talked of numerous leaders and of large funds, and of one individual in particular, (Thistlewood,) as having pecuniary resources; not only for providing arms, ammunition, and equipments for horse and foot, but for the payment of the wages of the thousands who were thrown out of employ in consequence of his plot, and who engaged to devote their labours to its accomplishment, demands which the fortunes of the Duke of Devonshire or Bedford would be incapable of answering. What appeared to be the fact, but that this man of inexhaustible wealth was in reality so poor as to be unable to appear on his trial in court in the ordinary dress of the country, but was content to put up with the jacket and trowsers of an old sailor! When the managers were arrested, they were found in a miserable garret, two or three in one bed, and in the depth of winter covered only with a single blanket. At least, therefore, if it were true that they had immense funds at their disposal, they had behaved most disinterestedly in appropriating no part of them to their own purpose. The subscriptions of which the first Report said so much, amounted in the whole to 11. 20. 3; and the whole scheme of summoning the Tower, taking the Bank, and seizing the bridges, was as contemptible in its reality as the Report had endeavoured to make it important in the representation. The cavalry was to consist of horses taken from hackney-coaches at a time of night when there were none in the streets; and the general who was to lead them had been appointed to his command, not so much because he could ride, as because from his lameness he could not walk. All the craft in the Thames, like the Tower, was to be captured by a single rebel; and when a few barges had been furnished with one gun each, they were to proceed to the Nore, to capture all the first rate men of war there stationed for the protection of the river. (Loud laughter.) Upon the subject of the ammunition waggon the Report had been very diffuse; and the right hon. member for Liverpool had added to the gross exaggeration by his taunt, that he could see no connection between a peaceable meeting for reform of abuses and a waggon loaded with military stores: yet what did it turn out to be but an ounce or two of powder in a little tin-canister, and a few bullets in the foot of an ancient stocking. (Laughter.) These, too, placed in the waggon by the miscreant and accomplice Castle, or by some person employed by him for the purpose. Having thus contrasted the truth with the statement, was he not warranted in saying that if the members of the Committee who agreed to the last Report were now called to confirm their former opinion, they would at least hesitate before they arrived at the conclusion. The right hon. gentleman who spoke last had observed, that his alarm was occasioned because he plainly saw that some men in the country entertained a design to corrupt the principles and pervert the allegiance of the lower orders; but what evidence was there of any such attempt? Did he refer to the men recently acquitted, and who had thus been cleared of the guilt of treason, but who still were not free from a heinous offence, for which had they been tried, they would doubtless have suffered the punishment of the law? After the exposure they had undergone—after the crimes in which they were involved, and the stigma that still remained upon them, it would indeed be a subject of deep regret, and of more astonishment, if these wretched companions and associates of Castle received any portion of the support or confidence of their fellow-countrymen. Did the fears of the right hon. gentleman then arise from the recent discoveries at Manchester, in a county where discontent undoubtedly prevailed, because the distress was peculiarly severe? Were there, however, no laws to check these discontents? Were there no adequate laws in 1792 and 1793, a period of ten thousand times more danger than the present, when we were on the eve of a war with the Revolutionary Government of France; when the Revolution was in its strength, because in the vigour of its youth; and in the height of its popularity, because it was untrammelled with crime? Why were those provisions now considered so inefficient when there are no affiliations, and no jacobin societies holding correspondence in the two countries? Passing over the intermediate period, was there no discontent in 1812, when Luddiam was at its height, and when all the formalities of a green bag and a Secret Committee were gone through to give it importance; and yet Ministers had not then ventured to propose the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus? The late member for Yorkshire (Mr. Wilberforce) had insisted that no resemblance could be drawn between the Suspension Bill and the lettres de cachet of France, and he had no apprehension of abuse; but surely when he so said, he had forgotten the names of Castle, Reynolds, and Oliver; and had forgotten, too, when he talked of the controlling superintendence of Parliament, that the House had refused to do any thing in favour of the liberty of the subject, and had recently rejected a motion to assert the rights of magistrates to visit State prisoners. As he considered this ground very tenable, the same hon. member had, with all the simplicity of innocence, put it to the House, whether it could suppose, that such a man as Lord Sidmouth would abuse the powers intrusted to him. It was an old saying, that if all men were angels, despotism would be the best Government; but as that was not the case, the law had wisely provided securities both for the rulers and the ruled: and, however mild, gentle, and inoffensive might be the disposition of the noble Secretary for the Home Department, he might be the instrument if not the agent of abuse. There were two ways of abusing a trust—either by voluntary corruption, of which, as it was not necessary for his argument, he (Mr. Brougham) did not accuse the noble Secretary. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Constitutionally speaking, and not swerving from the strict line of his duty, he ought to charge him even with wilful corruption. (Hear, hear, hear.) The gentlemen on the other side seemed surprised that the imputation was not cast, but for the sake of argument it was not necessary that he (Mr. B.) should go so far. There was, however, another mode of abusing a trust; the noble Secretary was not infallible; he might, like other men, be deceived; and that his sagacity might be imposed upon recent experience had shewn, for he was the admitted and recorded dupe of the informer Oliver. Private malevolence might find its way where self-interest had already made a lodgment, and the footing which Oliver had gained in the Home Department might lead to the establishment of others, with designs equally desperate and wicked. Oliver might point out a suspected individual; and a second informer, a second brewer of plots and mischief, apparently from another quarter, might direct the penetrating eye of the Secretary, who, lost in the strong conviction of the guilt of an innocent man, confounded by the cross-fires of the positive evidence he had so cunningly obtained, might condemn him under this bill to solitary and indefinite confinement. Who then was to give security that, even if the noble Secretary were free from voluntary corruption, he might not be made the tool of a band of informers, whom he had collected round his office, and who were daily filling his ears with tales of terror, of sedition, and rebellion? Much had of late been said upon the employment of spies, who, it was cautiously stated, might not be much the reverse of respectable persons; and it was asked whether there existed any charge against the moral character of Oliver? Was it nothing to prove that he was a spy and an informer, that he had employed the names of Sir F. Burdett, Lord Cochrane, and Major Cartwright, to inveigle the unwary, and to lead them into crimes by which their lives would be forfeited? Was it nothing against his moral character to prove that he was a cheat in fact, and a murderer in contemplation? (Hear, hear.) Was it nothing to say that he would have been responsible for every drop of blood shed in the contest or on the scaffold, to both of which he had led his blind and miserable victims? (Hear, Hear.) Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House seemed to entertain strange notions of moral character. Could a greater act of immorality be shewn than that of which Oliver had been already guilty? Could a more blackened, a more blood-stained villain be found, than a man who went about the world to ensnare, that he might betray, and to corrupt, that he might destroy? (Hear, hear.)—The hon. gentleman then proceeded to censure the period at which this question was agitated, namely, the eve of a prorogation, which would give Ministers the power of continuing the operation of the measure at their own pleasure. It was his firm conviction, that the existing laws were adequate not only to prevent the mischief, but to punish the guilty: if it were said that Ministers had not evidence to bring offenders to trial, what was it but a confession that the suspension bill was to enable them to punish, without proof, 170 individuals already in their power in Lancaster Castle, and other prisons of the kingdom. He felt no such alarm as the two Reports of the Committee endeavoured to excite; and he was prepared to set against them, and the evidence on which they were founded, the venerable authority of Earl Fitzwilliam, who, notwithstanding his constitutional unwillingness to be lulled into security where any real danger existed, was convinced that the fears of the supporters of this measure were without foundation. That intelligent and most excellent nobleman, had perhaps sometimes listened with too attentive an ear to the apprehensions of individuals; and just at the time when it was believed that the inclination of his opinion was against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, a story had been artfully circulated of some design by the rebels against Wentworth House. He had, however, treated the idle rumour with contempt, and departing from town for his lieutenancy, had been the most active in his duty, attending all the meetings of magistrates, and taking his share in the examinations and discoveries of Oliver. How far those disclosures operated upon the mind of the noble earl could not be known; but with a heart as honest as it was courageous, and a mind as delicate as it was sound, he must disdain all fellowship with such a disgusting crew of spies and informers. Upon this point he (Mr. Brougham) begged to quote a remarkable passage from one of the most celebrated writers in the Augustan age of English literature, Dean Swift, who said, "But of all things I am against a suspension of that law upon which depends the safety of the most numerous class of the community; and any experiment to suspend it yet made has not been such as to make me more in love with it; inasmuch as, besides that it is going against the cardinal maxim, that it is better that ten guilty should escape than that one innocent should suffer, it opens the gate to the whole tribe of informers—the most pernicious, corrupt, pestilent crew, that ever existed on the earth." (Hear, hear.) It was commonly said by the supporters of this bill, that in times of danger the Constitution required support. He begged leave to protest against this doctrine:—the Constitution of England was not made merely for fair weather, and if it could not defy and outlive the storm, it was not worth preserving. It required none of the aids which Ministers were so ready to afford, more especially against such beings as Watson, Preston, Hooper, and their fellows, whose understandings seemed to have been impaired by the miseries they had endured: until the streets swarmed with such base reptiles, until the units of their adherents were converted into millions, he would not believe that the Constitution could not protect itself, and that Englishmen must be deprived of their liberties under the pretence of its preservation. If, indeed, this measure were unfortunately passed, he hoped never again to be compelled to listen to the pharisaical cant of—how much happier and more free the subjects of this country are than the nations by whom they are surrounded; for what did the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act prove, but that the Constitution of England was of no use, and the liberties of Englishmen of no value?

Mr. Canning, after observing that all sides were agreed as to the ground on which this measure should be adopted, admitted that no one ought to give his consent who was not conscientiously persuaded of these three propositions: first, of the existence of danger; secondly, that it was of a sort to which the ordinary laws could not be applicable; and lastly, that the specific measure proposed did apply. The right hon. gentleman then, after stating that an hon. and learned gentleman, (Mr. Brougham,) had underrated the danger, gave it as his opinion, that all the affirmatives of these three propositions ought to be maintained. He considered the evidence on the late trials, and the result of them, as affording an additional reason for this opinion; and in answer to the argument, that the means of the disaffected were disproportioned to their ends, he desired the House to look back to the time when the mob of Paris sacked the palaces of kings. The hon. gentleman had impeached the accounts of the danger, and reprobated the employment of spies; but what would be the situation of a Government of any form if it were to receive no evidence of treasonable crimes but what it could obtain from men of unimpeached character? It would be satisfactory to the House to know, that on the testimony of Oliver no one had been arrested. He had the admission of the hon. gentleman himself that the ordinary laws were not sufficient for the repression of Luddism; but this Luddism, now extended to political purposes, afforded facilities to the disaffected which they could not originally have enjoyed. As to the objection that the powers demanded would be placed in improper hands, believing, as he did, those powers to be necessary, he could not conceive the Administration, framed out of gentlemen of this country, to whom he would not confide such powers. But as the noble lord at the head of the Home Department had been made the object of attack, he thought it necessary to offer something in his defence. It was, indeed, altogether a new charge to say, that he was disposed to abuse the powers of his office; that after the humanity which he had constantly displayed,

"He turn'd a tyrant in his latter days,

"And lost the merit of his former praise."

One noble lord, indeed, had made a counter accusation, and had apprehended danger from the lenity and mildness of the Minister in question. He (Mr. C.) affirmed that there was no person to whom, under the present circumstances, he would not intrust the necessary powers; but of all men, he thought the noble Secretary, by reason both of his integrity and talents, the safest person to whom they could be committed. How then was any mischief to arise? The hon. gentleman had deprecated the argument that the British Constitution was pliable, and would yield to circumstances; but the deprecation of the hon. gentleman would not drive him from an argument which he thought strictly true; and he thought a temporary loss of liberty a much less evil than a lasting enactment that might be equally powerful in obstructing disaffection. It was absurd to say that this was a law against the people; they could not all be imprisoned, and the law was a law in his favour to prevent the present fermentation from exploding, to save the deluded from the wicked, and to save the wicked themselves for better times (a laugh): for he did not think the times so gloomy as the hon. gentlemen on the other side would make them out to be; and the state of political parties had nothing in it more to be lamented now than at any other period. If the hon. and learned gentleman, who talked of driving the people to despair, meant that the pursuing this are that effect, he (Mr. C.) believed that the Government carried with them the wishes and applause of all the loyal. (Hear, hear.) There were indeed those who possessed a morbid sensibility only for crimes, and who saw in all disorders nothing to be pitied but one person—the main-spring of all the mischief. For himself, he wished such a person no ill, and by voting for the measure he shewed that he wished him good, for he should perhaps thereby save both him and his victims; but he could not confine his sympathy to a person of such description, and forget the evils, which others endured, danger, anxiety, loss of quiet, and loss of property. In the name, therefore, of all the loyal and well-disposed, he called on the House to pass a law, which would save to society the deluders and the deluded, those who were innocent, and those who would be the destruction of both.

Lord Folkestone confessed that there had been a smile on his countenance at one part of the right hon. gentleman's speech, and it seemed to him very extraordinary, even after the reconciliation that had taken place, to hear the right hon. gentleman stand up for the talents of that poor doctor (loud laughter) who had so long been the butt of his most bitter and unsparing ridicule (loud cries of hear). Whether in poetry or prose, the great object of his derision, and that for want of ability and sense, was the noble lord whom he had so strenuously defended that night, and now, forsooth, he wondered that any person could object to confide unlimited power in the hands of a person, according to his own former opinions, so likely to be duped and misled. (Hear, hear.) Yes, the House would remember the lines in which, at different times, the right hon. gentleman had been pleased to panegyryze his noble friend, of which the following were not the worst.—

"I shewed myself prime Doctor to the country,

My ends attained, my only aim has been,

To keep my place and gild my humble name."

(A loud laugh.)

Yes, this was the view which the right hon. gentleman had once drawn of his noble friend, who was then described as

My name's the Doctor—on the Berkshire hills,

My father purg'd his patients—a wise man:

But I had heard of politics, and long'd

To sit within the Commons' House and get

A place, and luck gave what my sire denied."

(Loud laughter.)

Such was the opinion which was once entertained of the noble Secretary, a creature, the diagnosis of whose characteristic infirmity had so repeatedly amused the right hon. gentleman—

"The symptom, a dulness that sits in the head,

"And dislike to all changes of place."

(Hear, hear, hear.)

In no hands would he (Lord F.) intrust such uncontrolled power, but least of all in those of the noble Secretary; for, in his opinion, and in the right hon. gentleman's formerly, he did not possess that sagacity requisite for the discharge of such a trust.—The noble lord then proceeded, with great fervour, to point out several inconsistencies in the arguments by which it had been attempted to support the measure; among others, he contended that either the prisoners lately discharged, if guilty, were now turned out to increase the amount of discontent and disaffection, or if innocent had been most grievously injured; and so far from there having been no abuses, this was a most flagrant and scandalous abuse. A petition had been presented that very day, which exhibited a series of the most unjust and dreadful oppressions. Mr. Le Maître had been imprisoned seven years under the last suspension, though there was so little fear of him, and so little guilt, that he was repeatedly offered to be discharged on his own recognizance; and having refused, in order that he might vindicate his innocence by an action, was at last deprived of all redress, or even the power of justifying his character, under the bill of indemnity. And then the hon. gentleman bemoaned the heavy responsibility of Ministers! What could be the amount of that responsibility, when the House was refused the names of parties committed, under pretence of a fear of affording communications to the disaffected; who, if they existed, could not exist without knowing already the names of those with whom they were connected? He believed that the bill was pressed for the purpose of intimidation. A distinction had been attempted between the powers granted by this bill, and that exercised in France by lettres-de-cachet; but there was no difference between the two; and lettres-de-cachet, from being at first only employed on State occasions, had been afterwards applied to redress imprudent speeches, (loud cries of hear, hear) and in the end, to gratify the private fears or enmities of every great man: so it might be in the end with these repeated suspensions of the only security of the subject. There might be some danger, he admitted, from the release of persons, in the influence that it might have on those who were considered disaffected; but that was not enough to incline him to agree with a proposal to renew the suspension. If the suspension were passed for several months more, the reasons would be still stronger for the continuance of it, for it was not improbable that the disaffection would be increased. If it was good now, it would be made to appear so then; and by reasoning upon circumstances it might be rendered perpetual. He entreated the House to pause and to consider before they consented to the perpetuation of a measure which was of the nature of that horrible inquisition, which led in a main degree to the French revolution, and which, if carried long into practice in this country, might destroy all that was most valuable in our own Constitution.

The cry of question then became general, and the House divided:

Ayes, 376; Noes, 111; Majority, 165. The bill was then read a first time.

This bill was read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

FINANCE COMMITTEE. Mr. J. B. Brough brought up the sixth Report of this Committee (respecting the Navy) which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PAPER DRAWBACK BILL. Lord J. Russell brought in a bill "to amend an Act of the 54th year of his present Majesty, to regulate the payment of Drawback on Paper allowed to the Universities in Scotland," which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, June 24.

PERSONS CONFINED FOR TREASON.] Lord Sidmouth laid on the table a return of the number and ages of persons who were or had been confined under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, and of the several and respective places of confinement. (See page 1479.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 24.

PAPER DRAWBACK BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

ELECTION LAWS.] Mr. W. Wynn brought in a bill "to alter and amend the laws concerning the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and for further limiting the duration of Polls," which was read a first time.

LEATHER TAX.] General Gascoyne presented the following petition of tanners, residing in the borough of Liverpool and its vicinity, for the repeal of the Leather Tax.—"That the petitioners venture to throw themselves once more upon the wisdom and consideration of the House, to press upon their attention the late impolitic and destructive additional duty upon leather, which, up to the present period, has been attended with all the baneful results they had ventured to predict at the time of its being levied, and which, if suffered to continue, must necessarily be productive of still more calamitous effects upon those carrying on the tanning trade, and will throw out of employ a large proportion of persons at present supported by manual labour: that since the levying of the new duty, numbers before supported by the trade, have wholly abandoned it, and those who to this time carry on the tanning business, have continued it under the sanguine expectation of receiving aid from the House; this ground of hope was further strengthened by the petitioners observing the small majority by which the additional duty was carried, and the prevailing feeling manifested by the House, that the case of the tanners was one of peculiar hardship; the perseverance of the petitioners, in continuing to follow their business under the prospect of almost certain loss, is further to be accounted for by the ruinous consequences necessarily attendant upon the conversion of their premises and capital to other pursuits and occupations; that they humbly presume to advert to the nearly total cessation of the tannage of foreign hides, which they conceive is chiefly to be attributed to the high rate of duty, which renders it almost impossible for the tanners in this country to bring them into the market secure from loss, the consequence of which is the exportation of them to foreign markets, to the manifest loss both of the trade and of the revenue; that the petitioners beseech the House to take into consideration the propriety of remunerating the tanners at large for the severe and unavoidable loss accruing from the levying of the additional duty upon the stocks in hand at the time of impost, which the House will please to bear in remembrance was contrary to the precedent established in the reign of Queen Anne; and they further beg to call their attention to the recommendation by a Committee of the House last session, that such remuneration should be made; the petitioners therefore earnestly but respectfully pray, that the House will, without delay, take the nature and operation of the additional tax into consideration, from which discussion by the House they anticipate they will perceive the necessity of withdrawing the late additional duty, a measure which the petitioners conceive is called for on every principle of policy and justice, and with a view of preserving this great staple manufacture from impending ruin."

On the motion for bringing up the petition,

Lord Althorp expressed his hope that the House would listen to the prayer of the petitioners, who had suffered materially from the circumstances of which they complained.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had no objection to the reception of the petition, although he retained the opinions which he had expressed on a former occasion.

Mr. W. Smith hoped the right honourable gentleman would be induced to reconsider the subject.

Sir T. Acland and Mr. Benson supported the prayer of the petitioners.

The petition was then brought up, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

STEAM-BOATS.] The Committee on this subject presented their Report, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

CONFISCATION OF BRITISH PROPERTY IN

DENMARK.] Sir J. Mackintosh presented the following petition of Merchants and Manufacturers of Leeds, Wakefield, and Sheffield, in the county of York, on behalf of themselves, and others in a similar situation.—“That the petitioners have sustained very heavy losses, in consequence of the confiscation by the Danish Government, in the year 1807, of British property, and of all debts due to British subjects; and as the peculiar circumstances of the attack upon Copenhagen, the capture of the Danish fleet, and the condemnation of the Danish merchant ships and their cargoes, which were seized in the British harbours, or captured previous to hostilities, seemed to justify this unusual severity, as a measure of retaliation on the part of Denmark, the petitioners were naturally led to expect relief from the proceeds of the said ships and cargoes which had been condemned to the Crown, a very small proportion of which would have amply sufficed; and they accordingly addressed several memorials to the Lords of his Majesty’s Treasury, praying for such relief. They relied with the greater confidence on obtaining it, seeing that the confiscation of their property was altogether owing to circumstances which were productive of great national benefit, and that the funds to which they looked for relief consisted chiefly of property which had been destined by the Danish merchants, in substance and in gross, if not in detail, to the liquidation of those very debts which were afterwards confiscated by the Danish Government; that the petitioners, in an early stage of their applications, were led to hope that they were favourably received, from having been requested to send a statement and classification of their claims to the Treasury, and from being told that a portion of the proceeds of the confiscated Danish property would for some time be kept unappropriated, but several objections were afterwards made to their claims, namely, the want of a precedent, and that they might probably recover their property on the return of peace: and at the same time they were consoled with an assurance that it was the intention of his Majesty’s Ministers, in the event of a negotiation with Denmark, not to lose sight of their interests; and lastly, the Lords of the Treasury intimated by their Secretary, on the 3d of July 1809, that they could not recommend to his Majesty to grant the relief prayed for, on two grounds, namely, first, that there was nothing in the case of the petitioners to distinguish it from all other cases where war might be commenced without previous notice; and secondly, that the manner in which the Danish Government had retaliated upon the property of British subjects, contrary to the usages of modern warfare, could furnish no ground upon which the petitioners’ claims could be allowed, without great public mischief, as it would necessarily go far towards the establishing the seizure or forfeiture of property so circumstanced as a principle in the conduct of future wars, and would give an additional motive for the enemy to practise it; that the petitioners, feeling severely the loss of their property, were induced, along with others in the same situation, to make further representations of their case to the Lords of the Treasury, and, at an interview with the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the year 1812, he was pleased to intimate, that although he saw no reason to grant their request, he was yet willing to receive any additional statement which they might wish to submit; and another memorial was accordingly addressed to the Lords of the Treasury, in which it was satisfactorily proved, as the petitioners conceive, that the war with Denmark, in respect of its original motive and sole object, the manner in which it was conducted, and the very great advantages derived from it to the British Crown and nation, was altogether unprecedented, and that it was not within the ordinary course of human events that a similar war should again occur, and therefore that any relief to be granted to the petitioners could never be drawn into a precedent on any future occasion; and they also shewed that the relief which they claimed was fully supported by precedent, in the indemnification granted to the merchants who had suffered from the confiscations in Spain out of the proceeds of the Spanish frigates which were captured in 1805, and condemned to the Crown; they further endeavoured particularly to impress upon their lordships, that, as the Danish mercantile property which was confiscated by the British Government greatly exceeded the confiscations of British property in Denmark, therefore, if any stipulation should be made in the treaty of peace for the restitution of confiscated property, it would no doubt be mutual, and that the Danish Government, instead of refunding any thing, would have to receive a large balance from the British Government; and, on the other hand, if the treaty did not provide for the restitution of confiscated property, then the funds belonging to the petitioners, which had been paid into the Danish treasury, were to be considered as irrecoverably lost; and the petitioners submitted that these considerations pleaded strongly for the present application of a part of the confiscated Danish property for the liquidation of their claims; and the said memorial was delivered to the late Mr. Perceval in May 1812, a few days before his lamented death, and a duplicate was afterwards lodged at the Treasury, and copies were also handed to three of his Majesty’s present Ministers individually, but no answer was returned to the petitioners, further than verbal assurances that their interests would be attended to in the event of any negotiations with Denmark; and being thus ultimately compelled to rely on these assurances, as their only hope, they looked forward to the period of peace with great anxiety; and in July 1814, the petitioners of Leeds and Wakefield, presuming that a treaty was then about to be concluded with Denmark, addressed a memorial to the First Lord of the Treasury, praying that their case might be taken into consideration in the pending arrangements, and that provision might be made therein for their relief; to which application an answer was received from the Board of Trade, stating that the treaty with Denmark, which had been recently ratified, contained an article on the subject of sequestrations, and directing all claims on that account to be addressed to Augustus John Foster, Esquire, his Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, who had been instructed to attend to such applications; on receiving the intelligence which seemed to realize their most sanguine expectations, the petitioners applied to Mr. Foster, who happened at that time to be in England; but it did not appear that he had received any instructions relative to sequestered or confiscated property; and, upon examining the eleventh article of the treaty with Denmark, they perceived, to their great astonishment, that it effectually cut off all hope of relief on account of property confiscated, and, in fact, guaranteed the Danish Government against all future claims on that subject, being conceived in the following terms: "The sequestrations which have been laid by either of the contracting parties on property not already confiscated or condemned, shall be raised immediately after the ratification of this treaty;" the petitioners felt that, in so far as concerned them, this article was quite nugatory, for the holders of sequestered property were obliged, very soon after the first decree of sequestration, to render an account thereof to their Government under the pain of death, in order that it might be confiscated; and the petitioners, in their said memorial of 1812, had relinquished all claim for property which was merely sequestered, and limited their prayer for relief to cases where it had been actually confiscated, and paid into the Danish treasury; that the property thus abandoned to Denmark amounts, as nearly as the petitioners can judge, to 200,000*l.*, and they cannot believe that so great a sacrifice of British interests would have been made to an enemy suing for peace, or that his Majesty's Ministers, for the first time in modern history, would have sanctioned, by a solemn treaty, the right of a foreign Government to confiscate debts due to British merchants, if it had not been for the very great advantage derived by the Crown from the confiscation of Danish mercantile property; and the petitioners humbly conceive that their property has thus been doubly sacrificed, first, to the great national interests which directed the attack upon Copenhagen, in retaliation for which it was originally confiscated; and secondly, to the separate and peculiar interests of the Crown, in order that it might retain the confiscated Danish property, amounting, according to the estimate of an high and official character, to nearly two millions of pounds sterling; that after the above-mentioned declaration of the Lords of the Treasury, that the confiscation of British property by the enemy was a great public mischief, and that to allow the petitioners' claims would go far towards establishing it as a principle in the conduct of future wars, and would give an additional motive for the enemy to practise it, the petitioners cherished a justifiable confidence that whatever might be the result of the treaty with Denmark, the British Government would at least not abandon a great public principle for the advantage of an enemy, which was found to be an insuperable bar to granting any relief to the sufferings of its own subjects; that the petitioners feel the peculiar hardship of their situation more severely by comparing it with that of the sufferers from the confiscations of English property in the French funds, for whom an indemnity from the French Government has been secured by the late treaty, and although it has been alleged that their right to this relief is founded upon previous treaties, the petitioners have not discovered any specific article in their behalf, either in the treaty of Amiens, or in the commercial treaty of 1786: for the former merely provides that all sequestrations shall be withdrawn, and does not contain one word as to confiscations; and the treaty of 1786 only stipulates, in general terms, that the subjects of either state shall, in the event of a war, be allowed twelve months to remove with their effects and property, whether intrusted to individuals or to the state; the petitioners cannot perceive why these general stipulations should bind the Government to do more for the speculators in the French funds than they might have been expected to do for the petitioners, whose property was intrusted to the Danish merchants in the ordinary course of trade, seeing that Denmark was not in a situation to resist any reasonable demand of the British Government any more than France was, and that there were valuable colonies to be restored to Denmark, which might have been retained till justice was obtained from that Government; to conclude, the petitioners are persuaded that their present unfortunate situation is entirely owing to the great amount of confiscated Danish property, and they trust the House will perceive that they are in nearly the same predicament as if they had been obliged to contribute a large proportion of their fortunes to the wants of the Crown; in these circumstances they humbly beg to lay their case before the House, and humbly pray that the House will be pleased to do therein as in its great wisdom shall seem meet."

Lord Lasselles thought, on a general principle, that merchants could not call on the Government for an indemnity against such losses; yet that the case of the petitioners was very peculiar, and that hostilities having been commenced without notice, they were taken by surprise; he had, therefore, heretofore supported their claims, and should do so on the present occasion. After a few words from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had no objection to allow the petition to be brought up, it was brought up, read, and ordered to be printed.

ACT. I. Mr. Byng presented the following petition of Freeholders of the county of Middlesex. The meeting was called by the Sheriffs, on a requisition signed by Sir P. Francis, and others, and was attended by the Duke of Bedford and Lord Holland, who supported the petition:—

"That the petitioners feel it as of itself, and in the first instance, a grievance and degradation to be obliged to claim a right inherent and unalienable in the natives of this land, or to avert the privation of it by an humble petition to any human power, and most of all, by an humble petition to the members of the House, who profess, and ought to be, not their masters, but their representatives, and who derive, or ought to derive, their power, as they do their seats, from the constituent body of the nation, to be used only for the benefit and protection of those by whom they are appointed, with whom they are bound to sympathize, and whom they ought to represent; that the petitioners do not mean now to enter into a detail of those powerful, and in their judgment unanswerable, arguments, which have been or may be urged against the law still in existence, or against the continuance of it, by which the right of appeal to the established Courts of Justice for relief and security, against arbitrary imprisonment, is denied to the subject, without a case made out, without evidence produced, or even a plausible pretence deduced from facts or testimony examinable by the House; that the proceedings of the House on this subject, and the bill now pending in Parliament founded on those proceedings, have nothing to shew for their justification, but the Report and opinion of a Secret Committee, the grounds of which, or a direct proof in support of it, in any shape other than the naked assertion and supposed conviction of a majority of their Secret Committee, are not exhibited even to the House; that imprisonment of itself is a grievous punishment, which, while the benefit to be derived from the Writ of Habeas Corpus is, in fact, suspended, may be arbitrarily inflicted on any man in this realm, by a Minister of the Crown, on a bare, and possibly a pretended, suspicion of criminal intentions, which, were it real, would furnish no justification of the power so vested in such Minister, to deprive a free man of his freedom, without a specific charge made, or a time assigned for trial; that in the construction of all laws entitled to obedience, in those countries, at least, which are not avowedly governed as Morocco and Spain are, and as France has been, by absolute will and pleasure, it is essential to their due execution, that the true sense and purpose, and the motives of the Legislature, should be made known to the people, and that to be so made known, they must be promulgated: but it appears to the petitioners, that in the present case there has been no promulgation of the law in the rational and established sense of that term, that is, to instruct the subject in his duty, and shew him how he may avoid the penalty inflicted by the law, in this sense, the giving a power to punish without cause assigned, is no promulgation, unless it be contended that arbitrary and indefinite imprisonment is no punishment; that such charge or cause of imprisonment, if it were duly assigned, ought to be speedily brought to trial; whereas, on the contrary, by the Suspension of the right of the Habeas Corpus, the party imprisoned, who may possibly be innocent, and who before his trial ought to be deemed so, is first deprived of his liberty: secondly, of an appeal to the King's protection in his High Courts of Justice, the Judges of which might examine, not merely the authority, but the valid reason of the Warrant of Commitment, and thereupon either bail or discharge, or remand the prisoner; thirdly, that the party so restrained and imprisoned, may be detained in a solitary cell, and kept and confined during an indefinite time, or at least as long as the Habeas Corpus Act shall be suspended, at the pleasure of the Crown, since the Act of Suspension itself declares, that such prisoners may be kept wholly separate and apart from each other, so as to prevent all communication between them and with other persons, except such communication as his Majesty may think fit to permit; fourthly, that if at the end of any indefinite period, the suffering party should be dismissed and set at liberty, he would have no compensation or satisfaction for loss of time, for the confusion in his affairs, and the distresses brought upon himself and his family, and for a long privation of personal liberty, for which there can be no equivalent to an English heart; fifthly, that if finally he should still have the means of seeking some redress by an action for damages, he would find himself barred even of the poor and inadequate compensation which that remedy might offer him, by an Act of Indemnity, immediately granted to the authors of his ruin; the petitioners admit it to be true and constitutional doctrine, that the Executive Power of this Government may lawfully confide in the wisdom, and follow the advice of its Privy Council, and of its Ministers and Judges, in their respective offices and departments, subject to the constant superintendence and controul of the House, since all those offices and appointments emanate directly from the Crown; but they do most respectfully contend and affirm, that the House of Commons, who receive their legislative powers by delegation from the people, cannot of right delegate those powers to any other persons, or to any portion of their own body: that even in a Committee of their whole House, with a full knowledge of the subject on which it may be proposed to them to legislate, they cannot resolve or act in legislation; and that if it were possible for a House of Commons to pass a penal law, or any other, in absolute reliance on the wisdom and integrity of a Secret Committee, and without knowledge of the grounds or evidence on which the opinion of such Committee might have been formed, it would be equivalent to a surrender of the powers and functions exclusively delegated to themselves, and a transfer in trust to others of their own appropriated and unalienable duties; the members of this House cannot vote by proxy, much less can the whole House legislate in trust and confidence that any of its Committees, however individually well chosen, cannot make an erroneous report, or wilfully deceive or mislead the House; for a further and complete illustration of their meaning, the petitioners humbly desire to be informed, on what specific evidence exhibited to the House, or on what direct knowledge of its own, it has been or can be affirmed that a traitorous conspiracy has been formed, for the purpose of overthrowing, by means of a general insurrection, the established Government, Laws and Constitution of the Kingdom; they well know that the guilt of treason may be incurred by any individual, by merely imagining the perpetration of an enormous crime, and that acts of violence, deserving a rigorous legal prosecution, have been committed: but they know that these acts, criminal as they are, have proceeded from other causes or pretences, and have been done by riotous multitudes, incapable of acting in concert, and clamouring against taxes, or for bread, not for a subversion of the Government; and that it is impossible that they should be connected with or accounted for by the causes assigned to them by a Committee of the House, on loose general presumptions, of which the evidence, if there be any, has been kept out of sight for some professed, and to the petitioners incomprehensible, reasons of State, and is still unknown to the House, in whose view that which is not apparent ought not to be presumed to exist; for these reasons, on which the petitioners are unwilling to occupy the time of the House, and for others, which for the same motive they now omit, they do most earnestly pray, that the Bill denounced by his Majesty's Ministers for continuing the Act of the present Session, which declares that any person or persons that are or shall be in prison, by Warrant of his Majesty's Privy Council, or of the Secretaries of State, for high treason, suspicion of high treason, or treasonable practices, may be detained in safe custody without bail or mainprize, may not pass the House; and finally, that if the prayer of this petition shall not be granted, such measures shall at least be taken as may effectually prevent the Ministers of the Crown from dissolving the present Parliament and calling another, while the Act so intended and denounced shall be in force; unless it should appear to the House to be safe and reasonable, that a general election should take place, while the Ministers of the Crown have the power to imprison without bail, or mainprize any freholder, citizen, or burgess of this United Kingdom, whom they may really suspect, not of high treason, but of being adverse to candidates set up and supported by themselves, and by whose interest or activity, the election might be carried against them; the quality essential to the character, and inseparable from the duties, of an upright House of Commons; in a vigilant and anxious jealousy of the Ministers of the Crown; the House of Commons was not constituted to be a controul upon the people, or of late it has been taught by a doctrine of the most pernicious tendency, it was designed as a controul for the people; whether the present Ministers will or will not, in their immediate practice, go the full length of the licence given them, is best uncertain, but this the petitioners know, and assert without a fear of contradiction, that laws are made to guard against what men may do, not to trust to what they will do.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

KENT PETITION.] Mr. Calcraft presented the following petition of the Nobility, Gentry, Clergy, Freeholders and Inhabitants of the county of Kent, and took the opportunity of expressing his disapprobation of the measure in contemplation.—“That the petitioners yield to no class of his Majesty's subjects in attachment and loyalty to the Constitution, and they are persuaded that, however severe may be the distress under which every class of the community now labours, there is a general sentiment prevailing through the whole, to seek alleviation and redress by such means alone as are authorized by the Constitution; that the petitioners have, in the present Session of Parliament, made humble representations of their manifold grievances to the House, and have most patiently waited to see what steps would be taken for their relief, but hitherto they have the mortification to observe, that nothing has been done either likely to mitigate present suffering, or to guard against a future accumulation of burthens, even now almost intolerable; that the disappointment of the petitioners is grievously embittered by learning that his Majesty's Ministers have announced their intention of proposing a further suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the great bulwark of personal security; that the alarm excited in the minds of the petitioners is considerably augmented by the House having referred the said proposal to a Secret Committee, in part composed of his Majesty's Ministers, and generally of members most likely to fall into their views, from whom there is too much reason to apprehend that the result will be a recommendation of the Suspension of that important Statute, though much of the ground on which such recommendation may rest, is founded upon the depositions of persons implicated in criminal transactions, or who have engaged in them with a view of obtaining information, and impeding it to magistrates or the Secretary of State, and though they may have reason to apprehend, that the language and conduct of such persons may, in some instances, have had the effect of encouraging those designs, which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting; that the petitioners are humbly of opinion, that it is the duty of the House, in a case so unprecedented and so important, in which the usual motives and reasons for secrecy cannot justly be alleged, collectively to institute an inquiry into facts, and to examine witnesses, previous to any decision on so momentous a matter, instead of delegating their power to any Committee of the House; that the petitioners take leave to observe, that, until the present year, there existed no precedent in the history of this country, which could sanction the suspension of that great palladium of our liberties, in a time of profound peace, and undisputed succession to the Throne of these realms; that its suspension at this particular juncture, when it is notorious how many petitions have been presented to the House, demanding a redress of grievances, cannot but be viewed with jealousy, and create a suspicion that it is intended as a measure to prevent, by intimidation, the expression of the just claims of the numerous petitioners for relief; that it cannot require the surrender of our dearest privileges to baffle the machinations of the few, if there be any, who wish to take advantage of the general distress, to produce disorder and confusion, totally unsupported, as they must be, by such means as might render them really dangerous to the State; and if such surrender be deemed necessary at such a moment, the petitioners cannot foresee to what period they must look for their restoration, since it can scarcely be hoped, in so numerous a community, that no pretext can be found, which may not be exaggerated by evil and designing men, so to protract the period of the suspension of our liberties, that it may be finally of easy accomplishment, to substitute arbitrary power instead of that government by law, under which this kingdom has so long flourished, and by which alone, liberty and property can be secure; that the petitioners look to the Habeas Corpus Act as a most valuable part of the inheritance they have derived from their ancestors; that it is the pride and distinction of Englishmen, in comparison of every other nation, and they cannot, and ought not, tamely to surrender such dear privileges without remonstrance; that the petitioners are convinced that the existing laws, duly administered, are fully adequate to the repression of any disturbances that have arisen, or are likely to arise, in this season of calamity and distress, as they have heretofore been found, and that those committing excesses, may be punished without confounding the innocent with the guilty, and without encroaching on the liberties of the people; that the petitioners, therefore, humbly beseech the House to reject any proposal for the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and beg leave to impress upon the House, that the best means of counteracting the designs of the disaffected, if any such there be, is to be found in the adoption of such measures, as will convince the people at large, of the earnest endeavours of the House to afford relief in the present unexampled distress, and in proving themselves the faithful guardians of those rights and liberties, they are specially delegated to protect."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Lord Castlereagh moved the second reading of the bill for continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

Mr. Douglas said, he had maturely considered all the arguments which had been urged in support of this measure, and was very far from being convinced of its necessity. On every former occasion when a Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was obtained, the evil against which it was intended to guard, was of an extensive and general nature. The Report, indeed, had alluded to the ramifications of a plot to overthrow the Government, but the strongest charges had been not only disproved by statements submitted to the other House, by accounts to which the utmost credit was due from several of the places stated in the Reports as tainted with disaffection, but by the verdict of a jury at Norwich, and the verdict of a jury in Westminster-Hall. The last Report exclusively referred to the lower classes of individuals in the large manufacturing towns. But even in this point of view it did not appear to be borne out by facts. With respect to one of the towns alluded to, Birmingham, he could answer from his own knowledge that nothing could exceed the patience, good conduct, and loyalty exhibited by the population during a long continuance of sufferings and privations. The allegation in the Report with respect to that place he considered as resting on no proof. And even with respect to Manchester, out of the 12,000 people said to be assembled in March, with the idea of proceeding to London to force concession to their demands, it appeared that only 50 reached a distance of 50 miles from the place.—Did that look as if the neighbourhood was favourable to their views, or as if the combination was so general as had been stated? The evil therefore was restricted and partial, and the remedy also should be partial. Why should the whole of England suffer for the misconduct of not a twentieth part of her population? This universality with respect to the operation of the measure, was what rendered it so very dangerous in the way of precedent. It was too much, that because districts in a remote part of the country exhibited symptoms of disaffection, the other parts of the country should also be deprived of their liberties. The noble Lord (Castlereagh) had stated, that the powers already given to Ministers had not been abused; but the House should remember, that it was the very mildness of the execution of the measure in the sound parts of the country that was most to be dreaded; when people saw that the suspension of their liberties was attended with no danger and no personal inconvenience, they gradually ceased to reverence them as they ought. There was nothing so dangerous as the mild administration of despotic laws. A great objection to this measure, among all to whom the moral character of the country was dear, was that, like all other despotic measures, it could only be supported by treachery and fraud. He did not allude merely to Mr. Oliver; he was not the only person of the same character to whom he referred. The Report of the House of Lords was cautiously worded, as all Reports generally were; but it disclosed the fact, that the people had been incited by more than one informer. They were all aware how easily a populace might, at times, be impelled by an unguarded word to acts at which on other occasions they would have startled; and this was particularly the case with a populace already half seduced by their distresses. Hence the whole of the evidence submitted to the Committee was of a very doubtful kind. He should like to see the persons who could state, in such a case, where the original intention began, and where the informers commenced their operations. Was the evidence which a jury in Westminster Hall had found insufficient to convict men whose conduct was far from unexceptionable, to be deemed sufficient to rob the whole people of England of their rights? There was nothing like a general combination in the present disturbances—there were merely local combinations for purposes of outrage and violence. These combinations had been much too frequent of late years. Nothing excited the astonishment of foreigners so much as the facilities with which riots were excited and repressed in this country. In England there was a broad distinction between the people and the mob: the people had advantages which were unknown to other countries, and hence they usually ranged themselves on the side of the laws. What was the cause of the success of the tumults in France at the Revolution? It was because there was nothing between the mob and the Throne, but the nobility, all the rest of the people being deprived of their rights. Our evils were caused by the distress of manufacturers, which supported Luddism; and which, to the discredit of Government, was suffered to exist too long. The disease could only be removed by an alteration of our policy, by a change of erroneous commercial regulations, by mild yet vigorous execution of the existing laws, by preserving the rights of the loyal, by not lending the dignity of the Government to spies and informers, and by keeping the courts of justice free from political considerations in the highest degree. There might be cases in which it would be necessary to surrender a part of our liberties for the preservation of the whole; but they must be proved and extreme cases. In such instances he would suspend either the powers of the Crown or the liberties of the people, if no other and better remedy appeared. Still the danger must be general and vital, and there must be a total want of all other appropriate remedies. Such a case was made out from riots, though flagrant, in remote towns. Mr. Hume had truly observed, that the King, the Parliament, the Judges, the laws were all established for preserving the liberties of the people.

Mr. Lockhart agreed that the great object of all was to preserve liberty, but that included the preservation of good order. The Constitution was best protected by watching every law and every measure, but it was also necessary to preserve public tranquillity. The present danger was shewn from the Report, and even from the admissions of hon. gentlemen opposite. Scarcely anybody denied that considerable danger existed, and that it was untangible by the ordinary laws. It was even said that some new code was necessary. All felonies, and murders, and riots, and treasons, were punishable if made out; yet it seemed generally allowed that our laws were insufficient to meet the present evils. Would gentlemen have recourse to martial law, the most abhorrent to the Constitution, to meet them? He must support the suspension of this valuable act, as the offence was new in character: though confined to six or seven counties, it was not so confined in intention. The essence of it was a system of delegations and missions, for the purpose of subverting the attachment, habits, and prejudices, of the people in favour of the Constitution, and of destroying their religious opinions; thus making a vacuum in the public mind, into which a new species of poison was to be poured, rendered palatable by the hope of reward, arising from the destruction of the property of the industrious: and this, not to create a new industry and property, but to occasion a total eradication of both. No other measure was applicable to the state of the country. It could not be maintained that the suspension had produced no beneficial effects. The evil had spread far before the law was enacted. The remedy broke the links of communication, and deterred others from joining in the plots. Gentlemen dealt only in generals, and appeared to have no other measure to propose. No man was less disposed to employ spies than he was, and he believed such was the disposition of Government, who could hardly be supposed capable of encouraging them in order to find plots for which they might get new laws made to crush the liberties of the people. What would be said of a general who did not employ such means when necessary? And was Government to be prevented from doing so in a time of danger? A spy would be of no use, if he did not accommodate himself to the views and habits of conspirators. He must put on a certain degree of colour, and must assimilate himself to those whom he was to detect.

Mr. Curwen said, he was sorry to see so thin a House on such an important discussion. Where was the necessity of hurrying the question through? Five or six individuals like the men who had been arraigned might do much mischief, but were not likely to overturn the Government. The plot reminded him of what Lord Thurlow said about a measure respecting the Isle of Man, (when it was urged that it would occasion much discontent among the people of Man,) that it was only a storm in a —. If those persons who had been tried for treason had been tried for sedition, he had little doubt but they might have been convicted; and one such conviction would have had a better effect than all the imprisonments and trials for treason. Spies might be necessary; but to push the system to such an extent, and to vindicate it as was done in that House, disgusted the country: the system, so extended and maintained, destroyed all social confidence, and produced in the minds of Englishmen the fear, the suspicion, and the baseness that had hitherto distinguished the most despotic governments. (Hear, hear.) Were not Ministers accordingly every day losing much of the confidence of the country? He could see no applicability in the law to the evil. If thirty persons without character, without fortune, without talent, without influence, were to run into riots, or even to dream of insurrection, was a law therefore to be passed affecting the whole people of England? The first Suspension was founded on the riots at Spafelds. Since then he admitted, there had been other riots, but they were not of a nature to call for any such law. On the Sunday, when Manchester was supposed to be in the utmost peril, a gentleman had been there, and heard nothing of it till he came to Stafford, five miles distant. Could any man pretend to say that the laws were not sufficient for any danger that existed, when he considered that only one person had lost his life, and for riot, not treason, during the last six months? It was argued that this power might safely be committed to such hands; but the danger was not from those hands, but from the hands to whom Lord Sidmouth delegated this power. (Hear, hear.) He would never, however, consent to suspend the laws of England, and to trust to any man. The more penal any law was made, the more difficult was conviction. This law was therefore excessive, and unoperative, but as an engine of terror and oppression. He called upon the House to reflect on the character which they had exhibited to the people during this session: More petitions for Reform had been presented to them than had ever been heard of on any occasion. Whatever variety of opinions might exist as to the remedy, it was undeniable that there was corruption in that House. All those petitions were answered, not by a denial of their truth, but by recrimination. (Hear.) Instead of economy, retrenchment, or reform, chains were the only blessing which that House bestowed. There never were greater expectations from any session, at least in his memory, than from the present: yet what had been done? Where was the retrenchment? Where the reduction of burdens? We had, indeed, wonderful financial arrangements, and unfunded debts provided for without any money to make the provision. (A laugh.) If a report should be made on the poor laws, it would have no present effect, and it would be forgotten before another session. If they had interfered for the relief of the distressed, instead of introducing arbitrary laws, the effect would have been very different, and they could meet their constituents with satisfaction and confidence. It was true Government was not in distress for credit; but it could borrow only because the general distress left capital unemployed: whenever the prosperity of the country revived, the Government would be distressed, and he wished that might speedily happen. (Hear, hear, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.) At the beginning of the session he wished to give his confidence to the Government, in hopes that some relief might be afforded to unexampled distress: but what had they done? This suspension of the laws was the reply. Instead of preventing danger, it was calculated to destroy affection. The last week of good weather had done more to tranquillize the people than all their Suspensions. (Hear, hear.) Even Ministers were compelled to admit that the patience and the sufferings of the people at large were never more conspicuous. In several manufacturing districts wages had fallen from 25s. to 5s. In return for all this patience and privation, they were exposed to the artifices of spies, to the suspicions of alarmists, and to the arbitrary power of the Government. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Barneswall said, that although charges and imputations might be cast upon him for his conduct, he would not cringe before the tyranny of clamour. It was a libel upon the Constitution of England to say that the suspension affected it; it was not so ill founded, its parts were not slightly connected, its materials were not so brittle as to be so affected. This was not a law to suspend the liberties of the whole people of England. "Let the gall'd jade wince, our withers are unwrung:"—the measure would operate only on the guilty. Two causes would prevent its abuse. 1st, The arm of the law, extending from the doors of the people to the highest rank of power and dignity: 2d. The superintendence of that House, which was not callous to any well-substantiated case of individuals or bodies, or politically servile to any party views. The hon. baronet opposite (Sir F. Bardett) had operated upon their feelings often when no injustice could be proved. Prudence condemned, and feeling revolted, from setting fire to combustible materials, or introducing the iron hand of power into a gun-powder magazine: but it was wise to prevent the accumulation of the elements of ignition. It was said that the juries at Norwich and Westminster had disproved the existence of danger. As well might it be said, that if a man had his head and hands cut off, he was not murdered, because the person tried on suspicion was acquitted. The rioters of Spafelds made no attack upon the shops of butchers or bakers, though they were said to be half finished. This was decisive of their intention. The people would feel their security confirmed by the suspension. When benefit of clergy was taken away in certain crimes, it might as well have been said, that it was taken from the people of England, as that the liberties of the people of England were taken away by this measure. He concluded by expressing a hope, that the goodness of the cause might not be affected by his inability to do it justice.

The Lord Mayor rose. He said, after the able and eloquent speeches he had heard on his side of the house last night, speeches which appeared to him irresistibly convincing, but which the division proved not to be convincing on the other side; he did not indulge the presumption that he could add any thing to what was so forcibly argued, or make any impression on those who had resisted the arguments; but he thought it a duty which he owed to the situation he had held for a considerable time back, and to the place he now occupied as a representative, not to give a silent vote on this question. He should be obliged sometimes to speak of himself; but from the circumstances of the case this was unavoidable. His exertions, he would fairly state, were constant and effectual; but they had not been properly treated by persons whose duty it was to pay his situation and his conduct more respect. On the day of the meeting at Spafelds, he took every step to prevent riot or outrage; he summoned all his men to attend; he was himself at his post. He came into possession of many letters connected with that business. Many of them threatened that himself would be shot, but those he disregarded. All the papers that seemed worthy of the least attention he carried to the Secretary of State's; but he must observe, that they had no mark of authenticity. He had discovered that they were written by designing persons, whose object was to create alarm, and not rebellion. (Hear, hear.) He had papers that would employ and amuse the House till this bill expired; and if they would examine them, he should be happy to procure, by such means, liberty to the people of England to breathe one day in freedom. There was one paper, however, which he would beg leave to read to the House. It related to the meeting at Spafelds, and was written by one who had been always attached to the Government. The paper to which it referred was sold for one penny, though it could not be printed for less than three pence halfpenny. This was a proof that the printer was employed, and paid otherwise than appeared at first view. He begged not to be misunderstood. The paper he was now about to read was not sanctioned by his Majesty's Ministers, but the paper to which it referred was. This paper was put up in several very conspicuous places.—"Spafelds' row. A penny's worth of truth. Go it, my boys." He would appeal to the House whether that paper did not excite to riot; and whether if it had proceeded from the other side, it would not have been thought worthy of notice. But this most inflammatory and mischievous paper advertised a publication sanctioned by Ministers. As to the meeting, when so many met together at so early an hour, when a few leaped from a waggon, and, joined by others, proceeded towards the city, all in presence of the magistrates and their assistants, when the cry was raised at one time, "To the Tower!" again, "To the Lord Mayor!"—why were no steps taken to prevent them? Why was no communication made to him? The first intelligence he received was from one who was not much attached to his Majesty's Ministers, but who loved his country, and deprecated the shedding the blood of his fellow-citizens. The officers were not in attendance with him so early, because they had been at an execution that morning. When he encountered the mob, consisting of many hundreds, at Cornhill, they immediately dispersed. It ought to be recollected, that in the pretended attempt on the Tower, they never proceeded to the Tower gates. The whole then of this mob, from a meeting of 15,000 persons, was at once dispersed without any military force. What was wanting in the laws in this case? In what respect were they inadequate to the danger? He afterwards found some papers in the pockets of a man whom he since understood to be Watson. He found Preston lying on the floor, there being no bed, and his two daughters in the same room, with scarcely any covering. No paper whatever was found in that room. On his examination, Preston talked of many thousands marching up to London to take it. This was the mighty danger that called for the Suspension! After all, this alarming insurrection was put down in one hour, it did not really last so long, and without any force. Was it to be gravely said, then, that the laws were not sufficient, and that the liberties of all England must be thrown at the mercy of the Secretary of State? (Hear.) From that time to this there had been no meeting in London. There was no evidence of any meeting; nay, their Committee expressly admitted that there was none. As to another part of the country, with which he was connected, where the population was very great, and the distress almost insupportable, where multitudes were obliged to endure the severest labour and toil, without sufficient sustenance, many living on four or five ounces of barley bread in the day, yet, in that extensive, populous, and distressed county (Cornwall), there was the greatest tranquillity. This was to him clear proof that the Suspension was not required. But the advocates of the measure had said that the law was not sufficient. The law indeed was not sufficient to punish where there was no offence, therefore this suspension of law was necessary in order to imprison upon mere suspicion. (Hear, hear.) These were his views and feelings on this question: he was sensible that he could not, particularly after the able discussion that had taken place, add any thing new; but in the circumstances in which he was placed, he could not give a silent vote. (Hear, hear.)

Sir W. Curtis allowed all credit to the conduct of his right hon. friend the Lord Mayor, for his conduct on the occasion to which the greatest part of his speech referred; but he denied that the effect of the present measure, which he opposed, would be to deprive the people of England of their liberties (hear), nor did he think it true that his exertions had been the only obstacle to the success of the traitors who would have deluged the city in blood. Good and loyal men would not have remained inactive while their property and their lives were in danger. (Hear, and a laugh.) The Spafeldts riot should not, however, have been treated so lightly by his hon. friend, and considered a little disorderly disturbance. It could not be denied, that the multitude had arms; that they had fired their guns in the air to shew how formidable they were; and in his (Sir W. C.'s) opinion, a mob so disposed and so prepared should be considered rather as engaged in treason and rebellion than in a common tumult. (Hear, hear.) Those people pretended that they met for the purpose of petitioning for Reform; he did not believe a word of the statement. (A laugh.) Why were they armed, if they meant peaceable petitioning? Were muskets and military implements the instruments of quiet Reform? (Hear, hear.) No; they wanted no Reform; they headed rebellion, and intended plunder. The right hon. gentleman (the Lord Mayor) had spoken of facing the mob unarmed; and allowed his courage to be inferred from the hazards of the enterprise; but he would remind his hon. friend that prudence made a part of courage. (A laugh.) He (Sir W. C.) had heard his right hon. friend declare out of doors that he had given the chief information to Government about the Spafeldts plot, and had mainly contributed to fill the green bag; but if this was the case, he thought it strange, that he, as a member of the Committee, had not seen in the bag the papers which he communicated. (A laugh.) A noble lord (Milton) had gone last night a little farther than he (Sir W. C.) thought he was warranted, in speaking of the insignificance or the peaceable intentions of Reform delegates. They always at first proposed peaceable petitioning, but they generally followed up that proposal with a recommendation of a resort to physical force, if their petitions were rejected. He remembered a meeting of delegates that was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, where there was a disclaimer of physical force; but these men used every means of inflaming the minds of the people, and after they had excited them to those disturbances which they pretended to deprecate, or exposed them to be attacked and put down by the military, they would turn about and say to them, "Go along, you ignorant mob: you have neglected our advice, and exposed yourselves to danger by your precipitation and folly." (A laugh.)

The Lord Mayor shortly explained.

Lord Deerpurcell felt that it would not become him to give a silent vote on the occasion, as an imperious sense of duty impelled him to come to a decision different from that to which he was led at the commencement of the session. He had then voted for the Suspension Act; he should now vote in direct opposition to it. On that occasion he was actuated, not by any alarm arising from what was past, but from a prospect of the future; and supported the policy of the measure on similar grounds as a man whose house had been on fire would continue to play the engines for some time on the smoking embers, after the violence of the flame had been subdued. Seeing that now the danger was completely extinguished, he could not agree any longer to this odious measure. Like the most deadly poisons to the human frame, it might sometimes be administered to the Constitution with advantage; but in both cases the necessity must be urgent, and the danger threatening, that could justify such remedies. If our political fabric had been in any manner dilapidated, or if any part of it threatened decay, let it be repaired; let the confidence of the people in its security and benefits be renewed; and let it be held together by the cement of conciliation rather than by the iron cramps of despotic power. (Hear, hear.) He should decidedly vote against the second reading.

Mr. Grenfell had, like the noble lord, voted for the suspension formerly, but he was not, like him, disposed to give a contrary vote on the present occasion. However much he regretted to believe that dangers existed which warranted this measure, and however reluctant he was to differ from those friends with whom he commonly acted, but who he was sure would give him credit for the purity of his motives, even when he could not coincide with them in opinion, he felt it his duty to declare, that he must give his unqualified support to the second reading. (Hear, hear.) It was said that there was no danger, because the people whom this bill was intended to check were low in rank, and degraded in character; but who that had read the history of the same class of men in France, could allow themselves to be lulled into a false security by such an argument? Were the Robespierres and the Dantons much raised at first beyond the level of our present agitators? and was their success such as to remove our fears? (Hear, hear.) In his judgment, the bill should be immediately passed.

Lord Cochrane observed, that he had nothing to say in the way of new argument, nor did he see any necessity for new arguments, as none of the reasoning against the measure had been answered. What was the House required to do?—to suspend the whole benefits of the Constitution. On what grounds?—on the grounds of a Report to which he was not allowed on a former night to apply the epithet, which he then thought, and which he still thought, it deserved. Was the whole kingdom to suffer for the errors of a few? Ministers called upon the House to rally round the Constitution; but how absurd was this call in the face of a measure which destroyed the Constitution. It had been remarked by a member of the Royal Family (Duke of Sussex) in another House, that when the sentiments of men were suppressed by a despotic measure, Ministers rather increased than diminished their danger. The remark was well founded, the warning was deserving of their notice. Look to the state of Italy, where the public voice was suppressed—consider the murders and malignant crimes that prevailed in that degraded and enslaved country. Let Ministers likewise look to the condition of Portugal, where the steel of the assassin superseded the exercise of law, and revenged wrongs for which the courts of justice afforded no redress. Did Ministers really consider, that by suspending our liberties, and claiming the powers of arbitrary punishment without a pretence of justice, or any of the forms of trial, they were doing all that they could to change the character of the people of England, to bring them to a level with the most degraded nations, and to render them malignant, murderous, and revengeful? He (Lord C.) never felt so much pain on any occasion as now, when he observed the measures in progress, and contemplated their consequences. The Committee had gone beyond its instructions; it was ordered to report information, and not to recommend specific acts of despotism: it was constituted in a way that made it nothing else than the tool of Ministers. At first the names of the members were pretended to be chosen by ballot; but an hon. member (Mr. Brougham) read the list before it was announced. Was not this a mockery, a palpable deceit, a delusion? Was it not like the packing of a Government jury? He (Lord C.) pledged himself to bring forward a measure to correct the present mode of balloting, and to obtain a more unbiassed election. (A laugh.) Then the Report of this Committee concluded by recommending a measure for the suspension of our liberties. This was of a piece with the other measures of the House. He did not recollect a single instance in which it had attended to the petitions or complied with the wishes of the people. Unless the House turned over a new leaf, unless it changed its system, it could not much longer proceed in its career. To suppose that borough-mongering oligarchy could be long supported by a despotic military force, was an absurd delusion. The British people would not allow their Constitution to be so destroyed, and that too by men like the present Ministers. He had now expressed rather his feelings than his opinions or arguments, and he could not help warning Ministers of their danger. A despotic

Government was always the most insecure, and a revolution was rapid in proportion as the oppression of the people was severe. The Duke of Algiers generally received the first intimations of discontent from the rebels who surrounded his palace to decide his fate, and who must either destroy him or be themselves destroyed. He (Lord C.) had himself been present when many heads were cut off for attempts at insurrection in that state, and he had seen them piled along the wall of the city, like shot in the arsenal of Woolwich. If the present system was continued, the walls of the Tower would soon be covered with heads in a similar manner, or the heads of his Majesty's Ministers must be cut off. (A laugh.)

Mr. H. Addington rose to make a few observations in reply to some points that had been stated by the Lord Mayor, to whom he had paid that attention which he deserved on every account, and which was particularly due to his first speech in the House. During the two first parts of the hon. member's speech, he (Mr. A.) thought he had forgotten the question; his remarks had been so irrelevant. He complained of a want of respect in certain quarters, but he was sure his noble relative, and all those connected with the Home Office, were anxious to show him all the respect which his zeal and activity merited. His conduct on the 2d of December had been particularly the object of their praise. Yet he (Mr. A.) thought that he had attributed too much to his exertions, (from which he was far from wishing to detract,) and had, without justification, reflected on the conduct of the Home Office.—The right hon. gentleman then detailed the arrangements made for preserving the public peace on the 2d of December; and contended, that they were as prompt and efficacious as could have been expected. Adverting to the state of the midland districts, he stated, that Oliver was introduced to the office of his noble relative as a good and useful character. He had been a respectable builder: he gave references to people who could vouch for his former conduct: he mentioned, that his only desire was to be employed in procuring and transmitting information, and that he had no sinister purpose whatever to accomplish. No reward was proposed to him, no hire was offered, nor had he been led to rely on the hope of any remuneration whatever. He (Mr. A.) regarded the whole question as involving a mere difference of opinion with regard to the nature and tendency of acknowledged facts. He trusted that hon. members on the other side did not arrogate to themselves an exclusive attachment to the constitutional rights of the subject; at least, he was sure that the love of power must be exceedingly strong, if for its gratification it could cover an authority, the exercise of which was attended with so much responsibility, anxiety, and trouble.

The Lord Mayor, in explanation, stated that he had always received the most and prompt attention from the right hon. gentleman, whenever he required his assistance; but upon the occasion alluded to, namely, on the 2d of December, he must repeat that no cavalry were in Skinner Street or near the Tower, and that the first appearance of any cavalry was at Aldgate, after the outrages were committed, and when the people were employed in collecting the arms which were scattered about the streets. As to the inflammatory paper to which he had referred, he contended, that as it was issued at so low a rate as not to defray the expense of printing, that expense must have been paid by somebody—he could not pretend to assert by whom.

Mr. Maudonald said, that he had some observations to submit upon this subject; but as he perceived it was the disposition of the House to close the debate for this evening, he should reserve what he had to say for another stage of the bill.

The question was here called for, and the House divided:

Ayes 80, Noes 30, Majority 50.

The bill was then read a second time and committed for to-morrow.

[WAYS AND MEANS.] Mr. Brogden brought up the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. Owenfall remarked, that he was desirous of taking this opportunity of alluding to the prospect held out to the country by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the speedy resumption of cash payments by the Bank of England. The right hon. gentleman, with a kind of triumphal flourish, had flattered them with this expectation; and when pressed a little upon the subject, had put a case which he seemed to think quite in point, and fully illustrative of the accuracy of his statement. He had the next day, for the purpose of putting it to the test, gone into the city, and on applying to three very eminent banking-houses, learned that they had so each note as that described by the right hon. gentleman in their possession. He had reason to believe, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had introduced the boast of a capacity to pay in specie at the present moment, in order to have what was vulgarly called a fling at the Bullion Committee—the meant that Committee of which his late lamented friend Mr. Hosmer was the chairman. It was important, however, that the principles of the Report produced by that Committee should not be misunderstood: they never maintained that the system of paper credit was injurious or dangerous, or that it was not of the utmost advantage to a commercial country: their doctrine was, that such a system ought to have its limits, and that the true and only necessary limit was the convertibility of paper into specie at the pleasure of the holder. With regard to the actual fact of paper having recovered its level under so small a compensative decrease in the issues of the Bank, it was to be explained by the prodigious diminution in the amount of country notes. That amount had been calculated at about 50,000,000*l.* of which it was probable 20 or 30 had been withdrawn from circulation.

Mr. P. Moore thought nothing could restore the integrity of the Bank but a return to its situation in the year 1797.

Mr. Ponsonby said, he had a motion to submit, unless he should receive some satisfactory explanation, on the subject of the actual amount of the unfunded debt. A part of this was called provided, and a part unprovided for: what he desired to know was, whether what was described as provided for, had been already paid off, or whether, if not paid off, the funds for that purpose were now in the Exchequer? Of the whole outstanding debt of 53,000,000*l.* and upwards, the sum represented as provided for was 11,897,900*l.*, and he wished to have a clear understanding as to what was meant by the phrase in question.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he thought it unnecessary to add any thing to what he had stated the other night respecting the payment of notes in specie. With respect to the bills alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, they were not actually paid off, because if they were, they would not have appeared in the account at all; nor was there money in the Treasury to pay them off, because if there were they would have been immediately paid off, in order to prevent the increase of interest. But they were stated to be provided for, because provision had been made for their payment by votes of Parliament, upon which the money had not been raised.

Mr. Ponsonby declared, that when he saw a statement that certain exchequer bills were provided for, he understood they were actually paid off, and such he believed was the impression upon the minds of all the country gentlemen, who would, from this statement, calculate that the country was relieved from the interest upon those bills: whereas it now appeared, he was to understand that there was no difference to the country, whether Exchequer Bills were provided, or unprovided for, and that we had still to provide for the payment of an unfunded debt of no less than 52 millions.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the return alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, was in the same form as that usually laid before the House upon the subject of Exchequer Bills; and that the statement that such bills were provided for, was rather technical than actual. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Baring remarked, that the right hon. gentleman was cheered in the course of his observations by many behind him; who did not at all, he believed, understand the subject upon which the right hon. gentleman was speaking. He did not indeed, himself, distinctly understand the right hon. gentleman. He required, therefore, ——— explanation ——— point, whether the amount of Exchequer Bills stated to be provided for was fixed upon any particular fund, which there was reason to calculate would prove adequately productive, or whether the whole of the 59 or 63 millions of outstanding Exchequer Bills were to remain outstanding at the close of the year, in addition to the nine millions which the right hon. gentleman proposed to issue? He did not allude to this additional issue with any feeling of hostility to the right hon. gentleman's project, for he really thought, that under present circumstances, this issue of Exchequer Bills was the best mode that could be devised to provide for the supplies of the year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that he should have been happy if it were in his power to furnish an accurate statement, but the result at the close of the year depended on so many contingencies, as to be necessarily doubtful at the present moment.

The resolutions of the Committee were read and agreed to, and bills ordered to be brought in.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] Sir J. Nicholl moved the further consideration of the report of this bill.

Several new clauses were added, and some amendments made, after which it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Thursday next.

TITHES.] The tithes leasing bill was read a third time, and passed.

BUILDING OF CHAPELS.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House went into a Committee to consider of a resolution for building Chapels for the performance of divine worship. In the Committee the hon. gentleman stated the outline of his which was in substance as follows:—To individuals to subscribe for the building of Churches or Chapels; and to authorize the majority of the parishioners to impose a rate for the like purpose, without the usual application to Parliament. No alteration to be made in advowsons on the present state of Church patronage, but subscribers to the building of Chapels to have the appointment of clergymen for a certain period. The right hon. gentleman also hinted the practicability of Exchequer Bills being advanced, under certain conditions, in aid of works of this kind. He concluded, by moving a resolution for leave to bring in a bill for building Chapels for the performance of divine worship, according to the Church of England, in parishes for which the Churches and Chapels are inadequate to the accommodation of the inhabitants.

Sir J. Newport thought that a rate ought not to be imposed by a bare majority, but that it should require a majority of three-fourths of the parishioners.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that was a matter for future consideration.

Mr. Gordon asked, whether the money voted for the building of national monuments might not be applied for the building of churches.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the House having agreed to recommend to the Prince Regent the building of certain monuments, the money could not now be applied to any other purpose.

Mr. Banks stated what had already been done by the Committee to which the consideration of the building of monuments was referred. He observed, that the sum voted for two separate monuments was 300,000*l.*; which, though liberal for that purpose, would not defray the expense of building two churches.

Sir T. Acland wished that some purpose of utility might be connected with the monuments to our glory, but thought, that both these objects could not be combined in an edifice devoted to religious purposes.

Sir J. Newport considered it highly proper that churches should form the monuments to our glory. He objected to clergymen deriving an income from the letting of pews; and hoped that this would not be allowed.

Mr. Huskisson said, that consideration would form part of the detail of the bill.

After a few words from Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Babington, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the resolution was agreed to, and leave given to bring in the bill.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, June 25.

HIGH SHERIFF OF TIPPERARY.] Lord St. Leonards laid on the table a correspondence between Ministers and the Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, relative to the high sheriff of Tipperary.

PETITIONS—HABEAS CORPUS.] Lord St. Leonards presented a petition of Freeholders and Inhabitants of the county of Warwick against the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill. This petition had reached him on Friday last, and he had twice before come down to the House to present it, but found that their lordships had adjourned. It had not, however, reached him till after the bill had passed that House: but as they knew by experience that the bill might come again under their consideration by means of amendments, the petition, he presumed, might still be presented. It had been almost unanimously agreed to at a public meeting, though the signatures were not so numerous as they would have been had it not been an object to send up the petition as speedily as possible. He had received letters from many of the most respectable persons in the county, authorizing him to put their names to it, which, as being irregular, he had not done: but he mentioned the circumstances in order to shew, that the petition expressed the opinion of the great body of the freeholders of Warwick.

It was read, and laid on the table.

IRISH INSURRECTION BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the continuance of this bill. He observed, that it had been before continued for three years, but it was proposed at present to continue it only for one year. The reason was, that it was hoped the system of civil police would, in the course of a year, be so matured as to render such a bill unnecessary.

The Earl of Donoughmore said, the reason given by the noble lord for passing this bill for one year was not sufficient to justify the passing it as all; though he did not mean to deny that there were some grounds for the measure; but while he admitted this, he thought that the circumstances attending its progress called for some observations. The first was, that to deprive the population of Ireland of the benefits of the Constitution appeared to have become a matter of course. It was the boast of England that no person could be punished till he had been put upon two juries; but by this measure, the Irish were deprived of juries altogether, and even of the advantage of trial before a judge of the land. It was a sort of family compact, by which three magistrates might try and give judgment of transportation. In addition to this, two new transportable offences were created, of which the one was, the being found absent from a person's usual place of residence at any time between sun-set and sun-rise; and the other was, the being found between sun-set and sun-rise in any other place than his usual place of residence, without properly accounting for it when called upon. When the measure was first proposed, he confessed that he was apprehensive that it would be executed with improper rigour. He had thought that the responsible Minister of the Lord-Lieutenant had too little experience, and that his views were not sufficiently enlarged for the government of a great country. He had, therefore, watched the execution of this law with considerable jealousy; and he was now happy to be able to say, and therefore it was his duty to say, that the act had not been improperly executed. He knew that there had been many persons ready to run open-mouthed upon the population, if they could get permission; but it was creditable to the Government that these had been checked. He was now convinced that, if such a bill must be passed, it could not be in better hands than in those of the Lord Lieutenant and his Minister; but still he could not but be sensible that the bill was carried forward a great deal too much as a matter of course; so much so, that even a short speech was hardly thought necessary to introduce it in either House. Why did not the Ministers deal with Ireland as with this country? They had suspended the Habeas Corpus Act here, but the measure had been introduced by a solemn inquiry by Committees of both Houses; as for Ireland, it seemed to be thought enough to say, you suspended the liberties of that country, being, therefore do it again. As far as depended on his humble power, such a measure should never pass again with respect to Ireland without a previous solemn inquiry and examination of witnesses. It was also proper to observe, that when something was to be done, nothing occurred to Ministers but measures of great severity; and this was particularly the case with respect to Ireland. What had they done in favour of Ireland? Ireland had asked a great deal, but certainly little had been done for that country. He did not mean to say that the present measure was particularly directed against the Catholics; far even if their claims had been conceded, still if the present disturbances continued, the measure would not have been the less necessary. Another topic which well deserved the attention of the House, with reference to the administration of justice in Ireland, was the appointment of sheriffs. It was of the greatest importance to Ireland that, in this particular, it should be put on the same footing as England. The correspondence respecting the high sheriff of the county of Tipperary would afford a strong argument for this point. He would not mix that with the present question, but it was his intention to bring the subject under the notice of their lordships at another time. With these explanations he assented to the measure.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the reason why he had not thought it necessary to say more on the subject of this bill was, that he had understood there was a general concurrence of opinion among those particularly connected with Ireland, that this measure was necessary; or at least that it was highly expedient that it should be continued. The previous proceedings with respect to Ireland had been different, because the disturbances there did not arise from political causes. This he had stated as a reason for not extending the Suspension Act to Ireland; and from subsequent information he was fully convinced that the opinion was correct. The disturbances arose chiefly from the pressure of extreme distress, arising from causes which no legislation could have prevented. He thanked the noble earl for the liberal manner in which he had spoken of the conduct of those at the head of the Irish Government, and he was sure they deserved the commendation which he had so handsomely bestowed upon them. The act had been enforced by them only in cases of absolute necessity. This had been acknowledged by friends and opponents; and though this was not of itself a ground for passing such a bill, yet it was satisfactory to know, that since the measure was necessary the execution of it would be in proper hands. With respect to what had been done for Ireland, he was sure he was fully justified in saying, that in financial and commercial arrangements the interests of that country had been particularly consulted; and had it not been that Ireland must now be considered as a part of Great Britain, it might even be said that the interests of Great Britain had been, to a certain extent, sacrificed in order to promote those of Ireland. With respect to the appointment of sheriffs, he admitted that it would be desirable to place that matter on the same footing as in this country, where it had been for 16 years past managed upon a purely impartial judicial principle. He had no affection for measures of this nature, but the bill was necessary and therefore ought to pass.

Lord Holland remarked, that the concluding sentiments of the noble earl were creditable to him; and if he would carry into effect the plan of putting the appointment of sheriffs in Ireland on the same footing as in England, he would confer a great benefit on Ireland: but still he had not satisfactorily answered the observations of his noble friend with respect to the measure itself. Seven years ago it was adopted as the child of overbearing necessity; and, after having been renewed two or three times, it appeared now to be continued as a matter of course, without inquiry, and almost without observation. * After pretending, too, that the measure of the Union would enable us the better to extend the benefits of the Constitution to Ireland, we were now confessing, 17 years from the period at which that event took place, that Ireland was in a state to require a measure of this nature, which deprived the people of a considerable part of the benefits of the Constitution. The noble earl had said, that the interests of Great Britain had been sacrificed in favour of Ireland; but if that were the case, how was it that Ireland was in a state which called for such a measure as this? That circumstance might serve to convince the noble earl that there was something radically wrong in the Government of that country. He confessed with pain, that he was not very fully informed as to the state of Ireland, but as there was no evidence before Parliament to shew the necessity of this measure, he should certainly oppose it.

The Earl of Limerick said, that unless this bill were passed, the lives and property of the people of Ireland would be in imminent danger. He was no friend to the principle of the bill, but the responsibility rested with those whose conduct had rendered such a measure necessary. What was to be done when the most abominable murders were perpetrated, and witnesses were afraid to come forward to give evidence? It was true, that the disturbances did not arise from political causes, and that the distress was dreadful: but it was notorious that the greatest excesses had been committed. If the appointment of sheriffs were to be put on the same footing as in England, he trusted that the act to prevent a judge from going upon that circuit where his own particular connexions resided would be revived. Ireland was a small country, and the judges had strong local partialities, and care ought to be taken that, in preventing the appointment of sheriffs from being made a Government job, they did not make it a job for the judges.

The Earl of Donoughmore was surprised to hear it objected to the judges that they were born in Ireland. He had a high respect for them all, including the Lord Chancellor: but at any rate the appointment would not rest with the judges, as their duty would be limited to this—to take care that no improper persons were recommended. With respect to the benefits conferred upon Ireland, the chief of it was, that Ireland having become completely bankrupt, by the management of the finance of that and this country, and being utterly unable to pay the interest of the whole of her debt, this country was so good as to make up the deficiency, and pay it for her.

The Earl of Limerick denied that he had stated it as an objection to the Irish judges, that they were born in Ireland. He had merely said, that they had strong local partialities. He was as proud of being an Irishman, as the noble earl, or any of the noble lords around him.

The bill went through the Committee and was reported.

SAVINGS BANKS.] The Marquis of Lansdowne presented a petition of the managers of the Bath Provident Institution, praying that the Savings Banks bill might pass into a law. His lordship said, he coincided with the petitioners in this wish, so far as regarded the general object of the bill, though some of the clauses appeared of questionable utility.—The petition was read and ordered to lie upon the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee on the bill.

Lord Redesdale went over the different clauses, and pointed out various parts which required amendment, in order to render more clear what he supposed to have been the intention of the framers of the measure. He also stated that he meant to propose some new clauses. One clause in the bill he particularly objected to, namely, that which authorized persons to receive allowances from their parishes, notwithstanding they might have money to a certain amount in the Bank. This was to encourage that sort of spirit which induced beggars to sew up money in their old clothes, where it was found after their deaths, but from which they never derived any benefit during their lives. This clause he thought ought to be expunged. He concluded with proposing that the amendments should for the present be received pro forma, and that the bill should be printed as amended, in order to its being recommitted.

The Lord Chancellor agreed in general with what had fallen from his noble and learned friend, but thought it necessary to call the attention of their lordships to the clauses which related to the relieving of the parties connected with these banks from the expense of stamps, and others which might have the effect of referring their disputes to the Court of Chancery. His lordship observed, that it was now 40 years since the practice began of introducing clauses into bills, which had made the Court of Chancery a sort of high-way, through which all canal bills, road bills, and bridge bills were sure to pass. This had had the effect of completely impeding that course of the administration of justice which was the natural business of the Court; and if something were not done to remove the evil, it would be necessary for their lordships to constitute another Court of Chancery. Much dispute might arise on the clause which obliged the executors of officers dying to pay the Saving Bank what might be due in preference to any other demand. Sometimes one act of Parliament, in referring to such events, ordered that one set of parties should be paid first, another act made some provisions for another set. It would be difficult to decide between the conflicting claims which might thus arise, and which might frequently occur; for he knew that the office of treasurer was much coveted, and one person might stand in that situation to several institutions. With respect to the relief from the payment of stamp duties, that would be found but a very small part of the law expenses in such cases. To give full effect to the intention of the bill, it would be necessary to do away these expenses altogether, as well as those which might arise in the case of persons dying intestate.

Lord Dynevor said a few words, concurring, it was understood, in the amendments which had been proposed.

The Marquis of Lansdown warmly approved of the principle of the bill, and agreed in what had been stated respecting the expense of stamp duties, and the necessity of securing the distribution of the effects of persons dying intestate. The latter was a point of great importance; for any doubt or apprehension of difficulty in that respect could not fail to impede the success of the measure. He concurred most fully with the noble and learned lord in his objection to the clause which authorized the granting of parochial relief to persons who might possess funds in these institutions. To agree to that clause would be to enact an inconsistency; for the great object of the measure under consideration was to rouse up a spirit of independence among the labouring classes which might counteract the pernicious influence of the poor laws. The clause was therefore quite hostile to the spirit of the bill. He was anxious that a measure which was likely to lay the foundation of a change in the habits of the poor, and do away the evils attendant on parochial relief, should be rendered as perfect as possible. *The advantage that a few subscribers to savings banks might gain under this clause was, in his opinion, no sufficient reason for retaining it.

After a few words from the Earls of Rosslyn and Donoughmore, the amendments were moved, and agreed to pro forma.

Wednesday, June 25.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] Mr. Bennet rose in behalf of an humble body of individuals whose situation was such as to demand legislative interference. A bill had formerly been passed for the regulation of the trade of Chimney-Sweepers, as it was called; but the provisions of that bill had proved ineffectual, and boys of the most tender age were still employed in the sweeping of flues. A Committee on the subject had found that there were 200 master sweepers in London; of these, 20 used their apprentices in the best manner they could; there were 90 whose conduct he could not praise; and the remainder were known to be of the most unfeeling and brutal disposition. In some parts of the kingdom, females were employed for this purpose, and, to the horror of the Committee, they found that smallness of size and delicacy of make were recommendations to the masters. Under these circumstances, the Committee recommended the prevention altogether of sweeping chimnies by means of children. He was sure that the mechanical skill and ingenuity of this enlightened period would find a substitute for the employment of human hands. Such a substitute had in fact been found: and the Committee had learned, from architects of the highest authority, that 95 chimnies out of 100 might be swept better by mechanical means than by children. When the extreme moral degradation of the wretched beings employed in this trade was considered, he thought there could be no objection to the introduction of a bill which he should now propose, for the abolition of these disgraceful cruelties.—The hon. member concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill “to explain and amend an Act of the 28th year of his present Majesty, for the better regulation of Chimney Sweepers and their apprentices, and for making further and more effectual provision for that purpose.”

Mr. Wilberforce rose to second the motion, and stated, that the nature of the trade was such that the mildest masters were necessarily obliged to be cruel on many occasions; and the moral degradation of these unfortunate beings was beyond all belief. Since the matter was first taken up, in 1816, two boys had stuck fast in chimnies, though belonging to very humane masters. In fact the masters were obliged to use a great degree of force in the course of instructing the apprentice. When the House considered that abomination, that insult on human nature—the employment of females in this horrid trade—he trusted there could be no opposition to the measure.

Mr. Curwen said, that means had been found which rendered the employment of boys altogether unnecessary.—Leave was given to bring in the bill, and it was brought in, and read a first time.

CATHOLICS.] General Thornton rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal such parts of the Acts of the 25th and 30th years of the reign of King Charles the Second, as require declarations, in certain cases, to be made against the belief of Transubstantiation, and asserting the worship of the Church of Rome to be idolatrous. He stated that the Acts in question had been made at the end of the reign of Charles the Second, when the Duke of York, the next heir to the Crown, was a declared Papist, and when the country was agitated by rumours of Popish plots. Bishop Burnet, in the History of his own Times, stated, that while examinations were going on, and preparation was making for the trial of the prisoners, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons, requiring all Members of either House, and all such as might come into the King's Court or presence, to take a test against Popery, in which not only Transubstantiation was renounced, but the worship of the Virgin Mary and the Saints, as it was practised in the Church of Rome, was declared to be idolatrous. This passed in the House of Commons without any difficulty. But in the House of Lords, Gunning, Bishop of Ely, maintained that the Church of Rome was not idolatrous. The Lords did not much mind Gunning's arguments, but passed the bill. And though Gunning had said that he could not take that test with a good conscience, yet as soon as the bill was passed, he took it in the crowd with the rest.—The hon. member said, his motion was not to interfere with the Oaths of Allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, which would remain in force, and which he thought would be a sufficient security to the Protestant interest. The present seemed to him to be a proper time for the repeal of those laws, as there no longer existed any political necessity for them. He thought it was hard on Protestants, to make them declare the worship of the Church of Rome to be idolatrous, as most of those who were so called upon, he conceived, did not know enough of the subject to be satisfied of the truth of that declaration, and some might know it to be an unfounded calumny. It was for another reason a proper time, as there was at present no clamour amongst the Catholics, which had formerly been thought a sufficient reason for not granting any thing to them.

Mr. Blake seconded the motion.

Lord Castlereagh was not disposed to provoke any discussions then upon the subject. He thought it would be more convenient to defer the consideration of the measure till another session, and should therefore move the previous question, which was carried.

SLAVE TRADE.] Mr. Smith brought up the Report of the Committee on the African Trade, and, on moving that it be printed, begged leave to read a letter from Sir J. Yeo, shewing the great increase of the Slave Trade on the coast of Africa, in the hands of the Spanish and Portuguese. One Portuguese ship had been captured, of only 120 tons, with 600 Slaves on board, 30 of whom died in a short time; the mortality, indeed, and stench on board were dreadful. It seemed that these two nations considered themselves quite secure in the trade, and were making the most enormous profits, buying a Slave for a quantity of tobacco worth no more than 4l. 10s. and selling him for 400 dollars. This shewed the truth of what had been often said, that it was to no purpose to abolish the Slave Trade in one country unless it were abolished in all. The question, however, was of the utmost importance to this country, but more especially in our relations with Africa. The great use and advantage of commerce was to accelerate the civilization of the world, and in general it had greatly promoted that object; but, the commerce carried on with Africa had always tended to keep that country in a state of barbarity and degradation. Such being the case, he should state the nature of the obstruction that prevented this country from carrying into effect its duty towards the negroes. After the Slave Trade had been first abolished here, so much to the honour of Great Britain; Sweden and Denmark, countries by no means neglectful of their own interest, followed our example; then Holland, whose god was gold, had succeeded; and France had also abolished the trade. None now remained to support the traffic but Spain and Portugal; and he stated this with indignation. Spain and Portugal, who owed their Crowns and their existence to us; whose fields were fattened with our blood—tefecerant ora quere nostro;—these nations carried on the trade, not only in spite of, but actually by the means of, our laws; and an additional evil was, that under their flag every other nation carried it on also. This proved, that the abolition would be fruitless unless every nation joined in it; but the trade, as carried on at present, assumed a most perverse complexion: for Portugal, by treaty, was allowed to carry on the trade south of the line, and Spain, north of the line; so that no part of Africa was exempt from its pernicious influence. Surely there was space enough for both, south of the line; and it was not to be endured that Spain should carry on this traffic to the very ports of our own settlements. It might be said, that some allowance was to be made for Spain, as being less enlightened than the rest of Europe, and seeing this matter with the same eyes with which we ourselves viewed it fifty years ago; but the fact was not so, and Spain admitted the iniquity of the trade as fully as we could. In proof of this he appealed to the convention of 1814, and to the declaration made in 1815. The latter contained expressions indicative of the greatest horror at this inhuman traffic. He did not mean to make any motion on the subject, as there was another member in the House much more qualified to do so; one whom all respected for his exertions and perseverance in this great cause, and whose name would go down to posterity immortalized by the abolition of the Slave Trade.

Mr. Wilberforce thought it extremely distressing that in that very part of Africa in which we had been healing the wounds inflicted by this detestable traffic, in which we had been sowing the seeds of civilization and security, fresh wounds should be thus inflicted, and the seeds of cruelty and wretchedness should again be sown. No language could do justice to the indignation and abhorrence excited by the very mention of 600 youths torn away in such a manner, thrown under the hatches, and left there, grovelling in one common mixture with their own ordure. The subject was entitled to the utmost attention from two considerations: first, because the practice of dealing in Slaves was entirely abolished by the House; and then, because the country where those horrors were committed had been the object of peculiar care and attention. He would therefore submit a motion on the subject on Tuesday next.

Mr. Barham said, there were only three modes by which this traffic could be put down: 1st, by negotiation with those powers who still continued to sanction the Slave Trade; 2d, by a combination between us and the other European Powers, such as was the congress at Vienna for a very different purpose; and 3d, by prohibiting the employment of British capital in this trade. It was with a view to put this mode into practice that he had brought in a bill on the subject.

Mr. Baring said, that no commercial considerations could have induced him to give the slightest opposition to a bill on such a principle; but the bill of the hon. gentleman went, in fact, to prevent trading with those colonies in which the Slave Trade was carried on, or to exact a security, which would only drive the trade of those colonies into other hands, as the abolition of the Slave Trade had driven that traffic into the hands of others. Whether the trade was diminished, or whether it was not increased by the partial abolition, he would not say; but the business of this country was, that this odious traffic shall be made to cease. (Hear, hear.) The alteration that had taken place had increased infinitely the misery of the unhappy victims of the trade. This arose from the cheapness of this kind of commodity. When the captains purchased them at 4l. or 5l. and sold them after the passage for 90l.; it was no matter to them whether they lost 40, 50, or 100 of them during the voyage. (Hear, hear.) The colonies of Portugal were thriving beyond all other colonies in the world through this trade. (Hear, hear.) He begged again to repeat, that no commercial consideration should make him oppose any measure that might effectually abolish the trade.

Lord Campden said, he should avoid going into the question at present, since the hon. gentleman opposite was to make a motion so soon on the subject. His hon. friend knew, and the House would believe, that it was a subject which had occupied the attention of his Majesty's Government, and on which they had bestowed as much and more labour and pains than on all other subjects.

The result of their attention and labour, and of their discussion with other Powers, they would with readiness lay before the House, if required.

The report was then ordered to be printed.

IRISH LUNATIC POOR COMMITTEE.] Mr. F. Fitzgerald brought up the Report of this Committee, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR.] Sir S. Romilly, in rising, pursuant to his notice, to call the attention of the House to the Circular Letter addressed by the Secretary of State (Lord Sidmouth) to the Lords Lieutenants of Counties, said, he owed an apology for having deferred the subject till so late a period of the Session. The delay had not proceeded from any insensibility on his part to the magnitude of the question, which involved considerations of the utmost importance to the administration of justice, the liberty of the press, and the character of the Legislature; but he had deemed it expedient, before he ventured to bring it forward, to weigh and examine it in every point of view, for he knew too well that these were not favourable times for agitating questions which regarded the liberty of the people:—he knew that it was not possible to induce Ministers to retrace their steps, and he was aware of the address and dexterity with which they and their friends would elude the clearest conclusions of law, and frustrate the strongest deductions from facts. (Hear, hear.) He could not, however, suffer a measure of such dangerous consequence as this Circular Letter to pass unnoticed; he felt himself bound to raise his voice against it; and though opposition and exposure might be of no use, still he would never neglect the performance of that duty which, as a member of the Legislature, he owed to the nation at large. (Hear, hear.) The House would remember, that the Letter from Lord Sidmouth to the Lords Lieutenants of Counties, dated the 27th of March last, to which he was now calling their attention, was a Letter in which he desired them to inform the magistrates what the law was on the subject of libel; that they had a discretionary power to commit persons for the offence of seditious or blasphemous libels; and having informed them of this law, on the authority of the law officers of the Crown, he proceeded to direct them, or what was the same thing, to recommend to them, how that discretion ought to be exercised. (See p. 1057.) Now, supposing the law quite clear on this subject—supposing that there existed no doubt or difficulty whatever, still it appeared to him that the circumstance of a Minister of the Crown, recommending or suggesting to magistrates how they ought to exercise a discretion vested in them by law, was contrary to the principles of the Constitution, and inconsistent with the pure administration of justice. But what if the law, instead of being clear, was, in fact, extremely doubtful?—And further, if the Secretary had represented that as law for which no warrant or authority could be adduced? But, supposing a Justice of Peace had the power of committing or holding to bail for seditious or blasphemous libels—supposing this to be a matter subject to no doubt whatever—he would ask, when a magistrate had a judicial discretion, whether a Secretary of State could be allowed to take on himself to interfere with that discretion, and to dictate how it ought to be exercised? That this was the effect of the Letter there could be no doubt. The words were, “I beg leave to call your Lordship’s attention very particularly to this subject; and I have to request, that if your Lordship should not purpose to attend in person at the next general Quarter Sessions of the Peace, to be holden in and for the county under your Lordship’s charge, you would make known to the chairman of such sessions the substance of this communication, in order that he may recommend to the several magistrates to act thereupon in all cases where any person should be found offending against the law in the manner above-mentioned.” That is, that in all cases where any person was charged with a libel, he should be committed to prison or held to bail. Nothing could be more dangerous to the liberties of the country, than the interference of the Executive Government with the regular administration of justice. It was common for judges to offer recommendations to grand juries, and he was not aware of any objection to that practice; but for Ministers to deprive magistrates of their discretion, and to exercise it themselves, was a monstrous violation not only of justice but of decency. (Hear, hear.) To direct that no considerations of greater or less criminality of intention, of inadvertence, of precipitancy, or of ignorance, should be admitted, but that in all cases they should exercise their discretion in the way directed, was an outrage upon every principle of judicial administration. (Hear, hear.) Magistrates had a discretionary power of punishing certain offences with greater or less severity. What would be said if any Minister of the Crown should take upon himself to direct magistrates to punish in all those cases to the utmost extent? (Hear, hear.) This was precisely the case here; it was an act of the Government taking upon itself to exercise judicial power: but even in this view of the matter, it became far more striking on considering this particular case. The power, where it existed, of holding to bail for obnoxious writings, ought to be exercised, and had been exercised, only on very extraordinary occasions. In 1811 the subject was discussed in that House. The act allowing the discretion of holding to bail on informations ex officio passed in 1808. Sir Vicary Gibbs, the Attorney-General of 1811, stated, that the power was so rarely adopted, that though during 3 years (from 1808) 40 informations ex officio had been filed, only one case had occurred in which that discretion was exercised. What made the argument still stronger, that was a case in which, after the information had been filed, a new edition of the libel was printed. In this single case of aggravated circumstances, out of 40 cases during the first three years after the law was thought necessary—in this single case—the discretion intrusted to the Attorney-General was exercised: yet this discretion was now so exercised by the magistrates in all cases whatever! (Hear, hear, hear.) In 1798, and soon afterwards, a great many complaints of libels were made; yet in that period, when the present Lord Chancellor was Attorney-General, not one single instance was to be found in which this power was exercised. This was a strong argument that the law did not authorize for, in the cases of Paine, of Barlow for attacking the privileged orders, and many others, supposed most dangerous, as corrupting and inflaming society—in not one of those cases was any attempt of this kind made. But, leaving the law at present out of view, this at least proved that the discretion ought to be most rarely exercised, that it ought to be applied with the utmost discrimination, and after the most deliberate care and attention. What should we think of a magistrate who should declare beforehand, that he would exercise this power, and say, before hearing the charge or the proof, that he would hold the party to bail? If such a case occurred, and it were brought under consideration, he had no doubt whatever that the Lord Chancellor would feel it his duty to order such a person to be struck out of the commission; but this, which no magistrate could do, and which the Lord Chancellor would be bound to punish, the Secretary of State had presumed to dictate to the magistrates, as proper for them to follow. (Hear, hear.) Upon the supposition that there was such a law, the Secretary of State had violated the first principles of the Constitution, and trampled on the most sacred rules of judicial administration, by giving directions or recommendations as to its exercise; by directing its exercise in this particular case; and by directing its indiscriminate application. But what if the existence of the law was extremely doubtful? Yet this the Secretary of State had admitted, for he could not venture to say of himself that such was the law, but that he had consulted the Attorney and Solicitor-General. They said it was law, but upon what authority? They had nothing better to offer, than that, in the case of Wilkes, such a power was not taken away from Justices of Peace. They stated two other cases since then, which had no reference to the question. In one of them, when Sir Edward Law (now Lord Ellenborough) was Attorney-General, the person implicated pleaded guilty, and submitted. There never occurred any thing before of this kind, except something similar by Lord Sidmouth himself, which he would notice by and bye. The Secretary, therefore, entertained doubts: and upon this, upon the fact of his having applied to the lawyers to say whether this was law, what was the conclusion that must inevitably be founded? If the Crown had power to declare what was law (hear, hear), the Crown was superior to the whole legislature of King, Lords, and Commons. There were only two modes of establishing a doubtful point of law: 1, by a declaratory act of Parliament; 2, by the regular and solemn decision of the Judges. In all times of our history, nay in the very worst times, it was not attempted to declare law in any other manner. It had been done by taking the opinion of the judges in an extrajudicial way: but that happened only in the most arbitrary and despotical reigns, and under the weak and daring Stuarts. (Hear, hear.) In the reign of Charles I., in the celebrated case of ship money, which was strikingly like the present, and any difference between them was entirely in favour of the ship money—in that case the Attorney-General, who knew what was the law, but who, according to Lord Clarendon, was bought over by flattery, had recourse to these expedients to sanction the measure. He argued, that the necessities of the King must be supplied by the people, and that the King was the only judge of that necessity; but he never thought of giving his opinion as law on the question. And would it be said, that what Mr. Noy at that time durst not do, the Attorney-General of the present day could do? (Hear.) The opinions of the judges were then taken on this subject. That it was doubtful, there could be no question: but the opinions of judges ought not to be law, unless the particular case be fully heard, and the parties interested have an opportunity of arguing it on both sides. (Hear, hear.) Objections were accordingly made on that occasion, that there was no case before the judges, and that no pleadings were heard; but the question was fairly brought to issue by one whom he would not be deterred from naming and honouring, by the prevailing fashion of undervaluing his conduct, and depreciating his merits—by the sycophancy and servility of those who paid court to Ministers by vilifying the founders of national liberty and happiness, and the brightest ornaments of human nature. (Hear, hear, hear.) The prevention of that arbitrary and unjust measure was owing entirely to the firmness and the honesty of John Hampden. (Loud cheering.) But when that immortal patriot brought the case distinctly before the judges, 10 of the 12 were so far corrupted as to adhere to their former opinions; and Croke and Hutton, names that he was proud to mention with a distinction so honourable, urged the strongest arguments against the decision in vain. The ten judges felt a sort of interest, a party bias, an esprit de corps, which led them to give this iniquitous and disastrous decision. In the reign of Charles II. in the case of Henry Carr, Lord Chief Justice Scroggs declared, that “to publish any paper or news was a breach of the peace, and might be proceeded against by law.”* What was the difference between these cases and the present, except that the opinions were then published on better authority than at present? Because, though they had not the advantage of hearing counsel on both sides, who might be supposed to make the most of the subject, the twelve Judges were much better authority than an Attorney and Solicitor-General, and much more likely to give an honest opinion. In a question respecting the liberty of the press, or the rights of the people, an Attorney and Solicitor-General were the very worst authorities that could be adduced. It had been truly said by the biographer* of Bacon, that “the offices of Attorney and Solicitor-General have been rocks upon which many aspiring lawyers have made shipwreck of their virtue and human nature.” There were striking instances of this in the cases of Sir Edward Coke and Sir Francis Bacon himself;—the one the greatest ornament of the profession of the law, the other the greatest honour to his country and his age. Never were there scenes of baser servility and more cruel persecution than at the times when those great men filled the office of Attorney-General, though one of them (Lord Coke) afterwards discovered great judicial virtues, and was the only one of the Judges who, having declined giving an extrajudicial opinion in the case of commendams, afterwards refused to make a submission to the Privy Council on his knees. Yet Attorney and Solicitor-Generals were now held up as oracles, so disinterested as well as so learned, that on their authorities alone decisions as to doubtful points of law might be promulgated!—This was not the only instance in which their opinion had been published as law. There was a doubt whether, by the Act of Parliament, the militia might be kept embodied after the termination of the war. Lord Sidmouth then wrote a letter to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, and the answer was returned within 24 hours in something like the following terms: “Having received your Lordship’s letter of yesterday, in which you state that a doubt has occurred, whether it be lawful to keep the militia embodied, &c. we are of opinion that it is lawful.” So that these gentlemen, without any time to consider the subject, returned without delay the opinion which was to serve as law for the whole country. In the present case, the opinion was drawn up in a way to lead one to imagine that it had not been the result of great deliberation. Instead of referring to the Commission of the Peace, or tracing the origin and extent of the power of Justices, they mentioned the case of Wilkes, in which they said it had not been decided that Justices could not hold to bail, and the cases of Hogg and Spence, in which the Justices had exercised that authority, and in which it had not been called in question. The opinion was loose and vague, but he did not on that account blame its authors; but what should they say to a Secretary of State, who on the authority of such an opinion, thought fit to legislate for the whole country, and that too in a manner in which it was instantly promulgated to every magistrate. If it had been done by means of the judges, it would not have been done half so quickly; if it had been done by means of statute, it would not have been done half so effectually. Not only was this doubt solved, but the magistrates were called on immediately to carry the law into execution. They had formerly heard of the judges giving advice on matters of law to the executive; here the executive took upon itself to give advice to the magistrates. (Hear.) If this was to be the case, if on the simple opinion of the Attorney or Solicitor-General, doubtful matters of law were to be solved, and the magistrates to be called upon to act confidently on their decisions, it became the duty of the Legislature to see that men eminently well informed in legal knowledge should be appointed to an office which had such important judicial duties to perform, that no men should be raised to it who were not deemed fit to preside in the Courts; but who, after a long period, might be called to fill the station of a puiſne judge. What should they say if an opinion on a doubtful matter of law were sent out to the country as determined on the authority of a puiſne judge? But they would not be less dissatisfied that the case should be decided by persons who were only candidates for that office. Nothing was further from his mind than any reflection on the last appointment of this nature; he believed that promotion (to the Solicitor-Generalship) was eminently honourable to all parties concerned in it. (Hear.) The gentleman who had obtained it had not bowed his way into that situation; he had not gained it by his servility, nor had he made a show of opposite principles to those of his Majesty's Ministers in order to be bought over. (Hear, hear.) He thought it necessary to state this when he alluded to the situation of the law officers of the Crown, and objected to their being intrusted with such a prerogative as they had lately exercised, lest it might be imagined by some that he meant personal reflections, and that he disapproved of an appointment in the propriety of which he heartily concurred. It was not to the particular individuals that he objected, but to the surrender of such a privilege into the hands of individuals so situated, whoever they were. The House ought not to forget that the Attorney-General did not, like the Judge, take an oath to administer the law equally between the Crown and the subject, but to promote the service of the Crown. Sir Henry Spelman had described this officer in these words: Attornatus Regis est, qui causas forenses Regis non solum promovet sed fortissima tuetur, more advocati. Was the House, therefore, to believe it safe or constitutional to allow doubts on the laws that affected the liberty of the subject to be solved by his Majesty's lawyer? If he looked back to former times, he found examples to shew the danger of such a practice. A case occurred in the reign of Charles II. in which a Secretary of State, who wanted the interposition of a law officer to accomplish an illegal object, found a willing instrument in support of an iniquitous proceeding. It was in 1684, the year when Russell and Sidney were judicially murdered, when the Law and Constitution were trampled under the feet of arbitrary power, and the forms of justice were made to cover the greatest enormities, that the instance to which he alluded occurred. The Earl of Middleton at that time wrote to the Lord Advocate for Scotland to take his opinion on the question, whether the judges could receive the depositions of witnesses against State prisoners before their trials came on. The Lord Advocate of that day, who mentions the circumstance himself, was Sir George Mackenzie, a man celebrated for his talents and legal knowledge, and who, on account of his perverted ingenuity, was only the more dangerous. He was sensible how contrary the opinion required of him was to the law; but he nevertheless answered, that the taking the depositions might, in ordinary circumstances, prejudice the judges; here they could not be prejudiced. (Hear, hear.) Having spoken thus much of the constitutional question involved in this Circular, he should now state to the House the course which he meant to pursue. He should first propose "that an humble Address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Copy of the Case upon which the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor-General of the date of the 24th of February last was taken;" and he should follow this up with the following two resolutions. 1st.—"That it is highly prejudicial to the due administration of justice, for a Minister of the Crown to interfere with the magistrates of the country in cases in which a discretion is supposed to be by law vested in them, by recommending or suggesting to them how that discretion should be exercised." 2d.—"That it tends to the subversion of justice, and is a dangerous extension of the prerogative, for a Minister of the Crown to take upon himself to declare, in his official character, to the magistracy, what he conceives to be the law of the land; and that such an exercise of authority is the more alarming, when the law, so declared, deeply affects the security of the subject and the liberty of the press, and is promulgated upon no better authority than the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown." (Hear, hear, hear.) He would now shortly examine the legal opinion of the law officers, on which the noble lord's Circular was founded. He did not think that opinion correct or consistent with the principles of law. He was firmly convinced that magistrates had no such authority as it stated to belong to them. He meant, however, to propose no resolution on this subject. There might be some doubt; and he did not think it became the House, as one branch of the Legislature, nor the other House; nor both together, to declare what the law was. In such a case all the branches of the Legislature must concur. But, if neither House of Parliament, separately, nor both together, without the sanction of the Crown, could settle this point, what was to be thought of an executive Minister, who took it upon him to declare what was the law of the land? Let the House consider the consequences of the exercise of this authority of the magistrates, so unconstitutionally declared to belong to them. They would have the power of committing or holding to bail, before indictment, every man who should be charged on oath, at the instance or in the opinion of any informer, with having published a blasphemous or seditious libel. It was well known, too, that blasphemous or seditious words uttered were punishable equally with publications of that character; or that the uttering of such expressions was considered as equivalent to publication: so that every man who published what any other man might think a blasphemous and seditious libel, or uttered a blasphemous or seditious expression, might be sent to prison, or held to bail, on the oath of the informer, by the command of any magistrate in any part of the country, however prejudiced or indiscreet. (Hear, hear.) The tyranny of the reign of Charles II. in prohibiting all works that were not licensed, could not be greater than this. It was folly any longer to talk of the freedom of the press. No paper, in any part of the country, could criticise the measures of Ministers, or render itself obnoxious to some busy magistrate, without the danger of exposing its author to imprisonment or expense without trial. The magistrate was not even bound to examine the publication which was declared a libel. The oath of an informer was sufficient ground for him to act upon. He would say nothing here of the new dangers that beset this new law, from the system of late introduced of conducting the affairs of the Government by spies and informers (hear, hear), who might insinuate themselves into our families, might listen to the unsuspecting conversation of our tables, urge on the ignorant and unwary to the use of expressions that might be construed into sedition or blasphemy; and then, by an exaggerated statement of what had been said, have them committed, or held to bail, at the pleasure of a magistrate by whom they were employed. (Hear, hear.) When this new practice was considered, the mischief of this Circular was beyond all bounds. (Cries of hear, hear.) But the power of commitment was not only given in cases where blasphemous and seditious libels were published or uttered, for the opinion comprehended libels on individuals as well as those of any other description. (Hear, hear.) He believed that the Attorney and Solicitor-General, when they wrote the opinion, given under their signatures, did not know the use that was to be made of it, otherwise they would have been more cautious and guarded in their expressions. If they were not told what use was to be made of their opinion, they had as good a right to complain of the conduct of the noble Secretary as he had. They stated, "that a warrant might be issued to apprehend a person charged on oath for publishing a libel, either by the Secretary of State, a judge, or a justice of the peace;" but at the conclusion of their opinion, they qualified the word libel, which, in the first instance, was general, by the epithets scandalous and seditious. This omission in the first instance, and addition in the second, shewed something so slovenly, that they would not have been guilty of it had they been aware that they were declaring the law for the whole kingdom. (Hear.) As there was no distinction between the kinds of libels, so there were no limits to the power of the magistrates in other respects, if they were permitted to commit for what was not a breach of the peace. Any other misdemeanour would equally come within the limits of their jurisdiction. So much for the importance of this assumption of power. He would now go a little into its history; and it appeared to him surprising, if this was the law of the land, how it had never been thought of till now. In 1793 the country was deluged with publications that excited the displeasure of Government, and which were accounted seditious; yet it never entered into the mind of the Government of that day to give the magistrates such powers. He remembered, that in Warwickshire, in Derbyshire, and in some other counties, men were prosecuted at the sessions for seditious libels, that were very provoking to Government. Two individuals of the names of Davis and Jones were particularly obnoxious, and were thought particularly dangerous; but this weapon was never employed against them. Yet there was no want of zeal among the magistrates: the two gentlemen who managed almost all the business of Birmingham were great Church and King's men; they had, of course, no disposition to favour seditious libellers, and would have received with pleasure any order of greater severity from Government. If, then, magistrates, overflowing with loyalty, and particularly inimical to libels of the kind alluded to, never thought of committing or holding to bail, it was evident that they did not believe they had such authority. Nor did any other person think they had such power. The then Attorney-General, (the present Lord Chancellor,) had no notion of such power, or was very remiss in his duty. (Hear, hear.)—He was now about to enter into the legal argument; but he should not detain the House long, as he thought it too strong to be contradicted, and too plain to require a long explanation. If the magistrates possessed the power of committing or requiring bail in cases of libel, they must derive it either from their commission or from statute. Their commission was totally silent on the question. The only part of it on which an interpretation favourable to the existence of this power could be fixed, was that which regarded trespasses; but the whole tenour of the passage, as Sergeant Hawkins had observed, shewed that trespasses there meant trespasses against the peace. (See p. 1010.) If it were not so limited, it must comprehend every species of trespass as well as this; and, therefore, as many species of trespass were not included, there was no reason to suppose that libel was. Lord Coke said, not as had been supposed, that the justices had in his time no power of commitment in cases of felony, but that they did not possess this power at common law, having derived it from the statute of Philip and Mary, and he cited a case in the 14th of Henry VIII. in proof of his assertion. Of the judges who decided that case, Brooke was one, and he inserted that decision in his Abridgment, than which there could be no better legal authority, under the heads "Peace and Surety of Peace and Justices of Peace," and "False Imprisonment." The next authority was that of Lord Hale, who said, that justices could issue their warrant to apprehend and imprison, before indictment found, for breaches of the peace. That learned judge, in speaking of the objects of this warrant, used the word crimes in general: but it was evident from what followed, that he meant misdemeanours, which amounted to breaches of the peace, and did not include those that only tended to a breach of the peace; for he added, that such was the universal and uncontrolled practice. (See p. 1011.) It was not the practice to commit for libel. It was said, in the case of the Seven Bishops, that a libel not only tended to a breach of the peace, but was an actual breach, and on that ground a warrant for commitment was justified. In 1665 there was a case to the point, but it occurred in a period from which no precedent could be drawn. The statute enacted then, which gave magistrates power to commit, did not refer to libels which were under the cognizance of Government alone, but to the putting forth of unlicensed publications. Several persons, and among the rest Dover and Brewster, suffered under this tyrannical law. It ordered the constables or other officers to enter the dwellings of persons whom they suspected, and search for books that were not licensed; and of whatever character they were, the simple defect of the want of license subjected their possessors to the penalties of the statute. The magistrates had no discretion: they were bound to commit on the finding of such publications. But these had no reference to libel: indeed, till lately, he never heard that magistrates were supposed to have the authority now stated to belong to them. The opinion of the law officers, and the circular of the Secretary of State, were a surprise to him. He had had many opportunities of seeing the practice at the sessions; he had conversed with many learned friends well acquainted with the powers of magistrates; but he had never heard any thing like the doctrine now advanced; and if this was the law of the land, which he did not believe, it should be altered as soon as possible. He had brought forward the present motion from no feeling of hostility towards the noble lord whose conduct was involved in the question. He entertained towards him no personal disrespect: in any intercourse which he had had with him, he had been treated with candour, and he owed him rather gratitude than opposition, but he could not allow his feelings to overcome his sense of duty. In considering his conduct, he did not conceive that the noble lord stood alone. He believed the whole Ministers were culpable for any illegality that had been committed, and particularly the noble lord at the head of the legal administration of the country. Such doctrines as were now justified, and such conduct as was now pursued, appeared to him to be extremely dangerous, and tended, if not counteracted, to operate the destruction of every thing that was valuable in our laws and Constitution. He would always raise his voice against such pernicious innovations; and if in after-times, when this country should be placed in that different situation to which it was hastening, and the liberties which our ancestors enjoyed and transmitted should no longer be enjoyed by our posterity, it should become a question with the curious or inquisitive how this change from freedom to arbitrary power began, what were the first symptoms of our decay, and what were the first inroads on the Constitution?—it would then be seen that there had been some persons who were not insensible to the signs of approaching slavery, who denounced the tendency of arbitrary proceedings, and warned their countrymen against them. (Hear, from Mr. Yorke.) The right hon. gentleman, who appeared to dissent from this opinion, was the descendant of men who had been an honour to the profession of the law; they would have beheld these precedents in a very different light from that in which the right hon. gentleman seemed to view them. If those who were to follow us made as rapid progress in advancing from the point at which we now were, as we had done with respect to our predecessors, the season for the melancholy inquiry to which he had alluded was not far distant, and the country might decline into slavery without being aware of it. (Hear, hear.) He understood that a noble person (Lord Sidmouth, see page 1059), had said, that if he were charged with having used his best endeavours to stop the progress of blasphemy and sedition, he pleaded guilty to the charge, and that, while he lived, he should be proud to have such a charge brought against him. (Hear, hear.) That noble lord ought to recollect, that this was always the argument of bigots and tyrants. Philip II. of Spain had been before him with pretences of religion to cover measures of oppression, and had shed without remorse the blood of thousands, that he might suppress impiety and heresy. (Cries a hearty) Could he think, or did any one really believe, that religion was neglected at a time when, as was known by his hon. friend near him, (Mr. Wilberforce), there were more persons deeply imbued with religious principles than at any other period; or could they suppose that irreligion and blasphemy, if they existed, could be suppressed by the means proposed; or rather, would they not see that Ministers intended by such a pretence to gain over a party who could not otherwise be induced to sanction their measures, and that they were injuring the cause of genuine morals and religion by offering them such hypocritical protection? (Loud cries of hear.)—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by moving the address for the case which had been submitted to the Attorney and Solicitor-General. Without that case the opinion was worth nothing, as it could not be known whether it was fairly asked; or whether they had time to consult and to consider the constitutional bearing of the question. (Hear, hear.)

* See State Trials, 32 Char. II. 1680.

The Attorney-General rose to oppose the motion. It was not customary, he said, to communicate the case submitted to law-officers, on which an opinion was required; nor was it necessary, if that opinion stated the grounds on which it proceeded, and was intelligible without it. In the present instance the grounds were fully stated, and the knowledge of the case could not in the least decide whether the opinion that had been given upon it was right or wrong. Unless some extraordinary parliamentary proceeding were to be founded on this opinion, he would not break through that confidence to which he was equally bound when he gave his opinion to the Executive Government as when he gave it to a private individual. He did not think that, except in extraordinary circumstances, the power of the House would induce him to violate his official confidence, or to surrender a case, except with the permission of the party who applied for his advice. The law-officers of the Crown had not transgressed the limits of their duty. Their opinion was asked, and they conscientiously gave it. As to what the hon. and learned mover seemed to say respecting that opinion, namely, that the law officers of the present day had betrayed a disposition to imitate the conduct of the judges in the reign of Charles II. by giving extrajudicial opinions, he would assert that those law officers had done no such thing, nor did they feel any such disposition. They gave their opinion to those who asked for it, and that opinion was, he was prepared to shew, perfectly consonant to the law and the Constitution. Although the law officers had been called elsewhere the paid servants of the Crown, he would say that no payment could withdraw them from the conscientious discharge of their duty, by giving, on all occasions, that advice which was warranted by law. But it was known, that whether in public or private cases, that lawyer, who would give a convenient opinion merely to suit the desire or gratify the wish of his client, without any view to the law of the case, would manifest an indifference to the interests of his client, as well as to the preservation of his character, and the practice of his profession. The conduct of law officers was, however, it appeared, in the opinion of the learned gentleman, entitled to little confidence or consideration, because, truly, their judgment was subject to bias. But there were, he thought, names to be found among those who had been law officers, which must claim the respect and consideration of the hon. and learned gent. There were Coke and Bacon, for instance, who, notwithstanding their aberrations, had manifested such manly independence as well as legal learning, as could not be too highly estimated. Yet, according to the hon. and learned gentleman, the judgment of Crown lawyers was so liable to be warped by their situation, that that judgment was quite suspicious. But did the hon. and learned gentleman deem such a suspicion applicable, when he himself was one of the law officers of the Crown? He was convinced of the contrary, and that the hon. and learned gentleman, at the time he held that office, was in no degree jealous of his own honour, or suspicious of his liability to deviate from rectitude through the operation of any undue influence. Why then should the hon. and learned gentleman entertain such jealousy or suspicion with regard to others? He did not pretend to enter into competition with the hon. and learned gentleman as to the extent of legal learning, or depth of political sagacity, or power of forensic reasoning; but he would not yield to him, or to any other human being, upon one point, namely, the conscientious discharge of professional duty. (Hear, hear, hear.) From this discharge he felt confident that he was not to be withdrawn by any sinister influence, or deterred by any public clamour. No clamour or calumny, indeed, should ever restrain him from the declaration of his opinion: he would never be deterred from stating his deliberate judgment upon the best consideration of the subject.—The learned gentleman then addressed himself to the argument. It had never been contended, or tried in a court of law, that a warrant of commitment for libel by a magistrate was illegal. He would look into precedents and text writers. Lord Hale had said, that a magistrate could commit for every offence, before indictment, cognizable at the sessions. Lord Hale laid down his position in the broadest manner possible, and left no doubt that it was his opinion, that parties may try indictments for libel, because libel has a tendency to disturb the peace, or, in other words, was quasi a breach of the peace. The sessions of the peace had always assumed the power to try for libel: but if there was any doubt on this subject, it rested with those who raised the doubt to settle it also. Why did they not bring the question fairly to issue? Why did they not go at once for a decision into the courts of law? It was open to them to bring an action against the magistrate offending: and if they should be displeased with the judgment of the lower court, they would have their appeal to the principal tribunal. They might carry the matter before the House of Lords. Till this was done, till some legal shape was given to the objections of the opposite party, he should maintain that the question was completely settled. He had never yet seen in any text book, or in any report of the decision of judges, any doubt thrown on the opinion of Lord Hale. Indeed, so far from seeing it shaken, he had seen it confirmed over and over again by the solemn arguments of subsequent judges. One learned judge had shewn, that the power of the Secretary of State and of a justice of the peace rested on the same footing; and as it seemed to be admitted that the Secretary of State had the power of apprehending and committing for libel, it followed that the justice of the peace had it too. He supposed that there could be no doubt that the Secretary of State had such power: it certainly had been decided over and over again. Two cases on this subject were particularly strong—those of the Queen v. Derby, and the King v. Earbury, the first in the reign of Queen Anne, and the second in the reign of George I. proved, without the possibility of doubt, that the Secretary of State had the power of committing for scandalous and seditious libels. (See p. 1019.) In the first of these cases he knew that Barnardiston had given somewhat a different complexion to the matter; for he had said that the justice of the peace had committed the libeller: but this, if true, only proved the case more strongly: for if there was a power to commit, there was a power also to apprehend; and that the justice had the power to commit was evident from this—that the Secretary never committed without the aid and assistance of a justice of the peace. Were all these proceedings wrong? Was the case of the Queen v. Derby wrong? Was the case of the King v. Earbury wrong? Was the case of the King v. Wicks wrong? On this last occasion every objection that could be raised was raised, and the judges were (he hoped he was not using an offensive expression) the astutest, perhaps, that ever existed, in all matters relating to the liberty of the subject. Yet though there was an opportunity for raising the objection whether the Secretary of State had the power of committing or not, yet Lord Camden, when discussing the legality of the warrant, had never intimated that such a power was not lodged with the Secretary of State. [Here Sir S. Romilly intimated across the table, that there was no dispute about this point; not a word had been said about it.] He was not at all disposed to occupy the time of the House unnecessarily, and all that he meant to urge was, that Lord Camden, so far from saying that a justice of the peace could not commit, had put the Secretary of State on the same footing as justices of the peace. Lord Camden had stated it to be the judgment of the Court, that the magistrates should; on perusal, form an opinion whether an alleged libel was a libel or not. It was not necessary, in order to authorize the interference of justices, that there should be an actual breach of the peace; except, indeed, in the case of a member of Parliament: in all other cases it was sufficient that there was a tendency to it. The question then was, whether, supposing the power to exist, it had in fact ever been exercised. And here many cases might be quoted where judges, at least, had exercised the power. When he used the term judges, he applied it exclusively to the King's Bench (hear, hear); and though when he wrote his opinion he had omitted to qualify it so, yet he had intended it; nor did he think it was possible to mistake his meaning. (Hear.)—The learned gentleman then proceeded to cite several cases for the purpose of proving that the judges, for more than a century past, had been in the habit of holding persons to bail for seditious libels: and he argued, that in these cases the judges had acted as justices of the peace, and not as judges of the Court. Now, according to the doctrine of his learned friend, all those persons who had been so held to bail ought to have been discharged, and yet where was the law of the subject to be found, except in the long, uniform, and uncontradicted opinions and practice of the Court? And it seemed to him a necessary inference, from the argument of Lord Camden, that as Secretaries of State could only commit in two cases, yet justices of the peace could commit in all where there was any cognizance of the peace; otherwise his analogy between justices of the peace and Secretaries of State fell to the ground. (Hear, hear from Sir S. Romilly.) At least, it must be allowed, that the words used by Lord Camden implied, that a magistrate had power to take cognizance of libel: for he said expressly, “the magistrate forms his judgment upon the writing, whether it be an infamous and seditious libel or not at his peril.” It had been asserted that Lord Eldon, when Attorney-General, had maintained a different opinion; but he knew that his lordship had always allowed that power for which he was now contending. In 1808, in particular, when the question was agitated in the other House, the Lord Chancellor had taken particular pains to give his support to this doctrine. In contending for this power to justices in cases of libel, he of course meant that the justice must himself see and read the libel, and not decide it to be a libel on the mere oath of any man. (Hear, hear from Sir S. Romilly.) Why, surely, his learned friend could never have understood him to mean that the mere oath of an informer would be sufficient for the magistrate to found any proceeding upon, either of apprehension or committal. No; the magistrate must exercise his discretion on the perusal of the writing charged to be seditious, and must act on his own responsibility, and at his peril. It had been alleged against the Circular, that the Secretary of State thereby interfered with the due and regular administration of justice. (Hear, Hear.) He had yet to learn that such an interference could in any way prejudice the process or ends of justice; there was no denunciation of persons by name, but merely a general recommendation to be vigilant with respect to the progress of an existing evil. Was not something similar perpetually done in the proclamations of the Crown? And could there be any doubt as to the utility of the measure? The grossest and most atrocious libels might have been with impunity hawked in every village, and placarded in every street, unless there had been some means of touching the offenders, before the slow process of indictment, or even of information. Before the arrival of the next sessions the offenders would have fled, never to have been found again. Who was to track the steps of an itinerant vender of sedition, who had no regular abode, and was never in the same place two days together? Such was the case which justified the transmission of the Circular; and yet, strange to say, gentlemen maintained that this salutary law, thus opportunely called to the attention of the magistrate, ought to be repealed. He was decidedly of opinion, that such a motion as the present ought to be negatived, unless some strong instance of misconduct in Administration could be clearly proved. He concluded by observing, that no man in the House could be more sensible than himself of his own incompetence to fill so important an office in the State as that which he now held.

Sir W. Burroughs observed, that the grounds on which he supported the motion, were the doctrines promulgated by our earliest and most constitutional writers. The authorities of Lambard and Dalton were explicit against the power of imprisoning for libel before indictment. With respect to the authority of Lord Hale, so much relied upon by his hon. and learned friend, (the Attorney-General) he begged leave to remind him, that the book in which the passage he had quoted, was to be found, was not written upon misdemeanours, but solely upon treasons, felonies, and capital offences. Such was the declaration of Lord Hale himself, and it was too much, therefore, to disregard the very title of the chapter, the subject-matter of that chapter, and the context, in order to twist it into an argument favourable to the opinions of his hon. and learned friend. It was most clear, that the word crime, which the Attorney-General considered as so conclusive, was used by Lord Hale, in the passage cited, as relating to felony and felony alone. The authority of Hawkins, too, so far as it went, was against the power now assumed by the justices. What were the authorities quoted by the Attorney-General, against those produced by his honourable and learned friend? They were authorities taken out of the Crown Office; and not the decisions of judges, or what were to be found in any text writer. Yet it did not appear, even from those authorities, that any individual had been committed or held to bail, who had not been previously indicted. But even if it could be shewn that custom was on the side of the practice now asserted, he should still maintain, on this particular point, that it was illegal. No similar case had occurred since the time when the question as to the legality of general warrants was agitated, and the doctrine then laid down by the Court of King's Bench was deserving of attention. The jury found a special verdict, and, after solemn argument, the Chief Justice declared, that though the practice might have prevailed from the time of the Revolution, it never could grow up into a law, whilst it was shewn to be abusive or injurious. Such a practice, he added, ought to be evidently beneficial, to be sanctioned by long continued usage, and to be consistent with the established and positive laws of the realm. Mr. Justice Yates and Mr. Justice Aston concurred in this opinion, and remarked, that no degree of antiquity could alter the nature of a bad law. The Circular of Lord Sidmouth authorized and required magistrates to arrest persons, and hold them to bail, before they were indicted. This was a practice that went to destroy all public liberty, and to subvert the regular administration of justice: it was a most injurious practice, and malus usus abolendus est.

Mr. H. Addington said, he felt it his duty to take the earliest opportunity of rising on this occasion, because he was perhaps the only person in the House competent to explain the special reasons which had induced his noble relative to issue the circular notice which was now brought into question. In the first place, it was natural for him to rely on the experience, the learning, and the character of the Crown lawyers; and he had acted upon their advice, and the information which he had received in his public capacity. Few would deny that the most flagitious designs had been entertained by considerable numbers against the Government and the existing state of society. The evil was daily augmented by the diffusion of seditious and blasphemous publications, circulated with the most unceasing activity. Frequent communications were received from the magistracy, stating the extent of the mischief, and soliciting instructions. What course, then, remained for his noble relation to pursue? Was he to refuse any answer to these solicitations, or to adopt the best mode of meeting the evil? Under the circumstances, he acted upon the soundest views of public duty, and issued the circular letter.

Mr. Courtenay thought it of the most serious importance that the House should mark its opinion of these proceedings. The Attorney-General, he observed, had not cited any case in which the question was brought before the Court; but the law could only be settled by the decision of judges, in cases brought under their consideration. Lord Mansfield, who was by no means disposed to weaken the power and influence of the Crown, had said, that whenever bail is offered, the Court never looks at the warrant. (Hear, hear, hear.) He (Mr. C.) did not charge the noble Secretary of State with any disposition to violate the law; but when the difficulty occurred, he met it in a way in which it should not have been met. He should have said to the magistrates, you have a duty to perform, but it does not belong to me to explain to you what that duty is; you are judges to a certain extent, and are bound to exercise a judicial discretion. No man could doubt that his hon. friend (the Attorney-General) would give his opinion in the most upright and conscientious manner; but it ought to have been stated to him by the noble lord, that his opinion was to be acted upon. If he had been told that his opinion was to serve as a guide to the magistracy, it was most likely that he would have given a different opinion. (Hear, hear.) For these reasons, the hon. member should certainly support the motion.

Sir C. Monck observed, that though the Secretary of State had a right to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on technical points for his own government, it by no means followed that he was to use that opinion to influence the judgment and conduct of justices of the peace. What greater right had the Secretary of State to dictate to the justices of the peace, than he had to dictate to the judges of the King's Bench, of the Common Pleas, or of the Exchequer? (Hear, hear.) The jurisdiction of justices of the peace might not be considered so important as that of the judges of the superior courts, but it was unquestionably very important, and, therefore, why should the Crown direct the exercise of their authority any more than any judicial authority whatever? The justices of the peace were as responsible for the discharge of their duties as any other judges of the country. He did not mean to impugn the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, but his Majesty's Ministers ought to have shewn that the circular letter was a mere mistake of the Secretary of State: for it was not possible that the law officers could have advised him to write to the Lord Lieutenant of the county, instead of the Custos Rotulorum. (Hear, hear, hear.) In many counties the Lord Lieutenant and the Custos Rotulorum were different persons. The Secretary of State had said that this was only a point of form; but it appeared that the Secretary did not know his business; and he had better have taken the opinion of the law-officers as to those two offices, than as to the point of law. (Hear, hear.)

Sir F. Burdett said, that after the question had been so ably supported, both in detail and in general constitutional doctrine, it required some apology from him for offering himself to the notice of the House. He had waited till the last moment, expecting some farther arguments from the legal authorities, since the Attorney and Solicitor-General generally ran in pairs; but it seemed that the Solicitor-General had left his colleague to bear the whole heat of the business. The only remaining constitutional branch of the subject which he should endeavour to support was this:—that no practice of the Courts, no usage, no dicta, could contravene the established law of the land. The law of the land was, that quis liber homo capiat vel imprisonetur, unless upon conviction by a jury of his peers. That this was the old common law of the country was allowed on all hands; but it ought to be considered with the greatest strictness in respect to libels, a species of offence unknown to the common law, and which had been adopted from the civil law, and more recently borrowed from the practice of the infamous court of Star-chamber. It was very extraordinary that, up to a late time, it never was discovered that any man might be imprisoned for a supposed libel by ex-officio informations. If it had been the law of the land before, why was a bill brought into the House to enable judges to hold to bail upon such informations? In the case of libel, how was the party to proceed upon a person going to any magistrate, and swearing that a man had published a libel?—only observe, swearing to a point of fact, that a man had committed that which was found by a jury. (Hear, hear.) In justices of the peace commit on oath; there has been a corpus delicti; an offence has been committed; and then they can hold the man in security for his trial; and the jury have to decide whether or not he has committed the particular fact. But in cases of libel, there was no corpus delicti, and it was impossible to tell what words an Attorney-General or a jury should decide to be a libel. In his opinion, there was no subject on which the House were more bound to protect the people against being improperly punished than on charges of libel. When first this bill was passed, it was said that the power would be very seldom exercised; but it had now become a matter of course, that judges, even upon the mere intimation that the Attorney-General intended to file an ex-officio information, held the supposed libeller to bail. They had now an instance of a person having been committed under this authority, and afterwards tried and acquitted. The hasty conduct, or, in other words, the imprudent seal of the judge on that occasion, deserved the most grave and serious consideration. To-morrow he should have a petition to present to the House, which would bring before them the judge's conduct as well as the singular hardship of the individual, who was now placed in a situation in which the Government could not punish him. The office of Attorney-General was to be looked at by the subject with great jealousy and suspicion; and he thought that the suggestions of the hon. and learned gentlemen with respect to his opinion might have been spared. The silence of the Solicitor-General gave the House great reason to believe that he did not coatur in the opinion of his colleague. The learned gentleman was there ex-officio to give them the benefit of his legal knowledge; but as he had not ventured to speak, it must be presumed, that he could not bring himself up to maintain doctrines which his better judgment disapproved. Was it fit that the Executive Government should instruct persons who ought most jealously to be kept separate from the Government? It was a very extraordinary proposal, that the House should be called upon to sanction an opinion without having before them the grounds of that opinion. Much had been said about a breach of confidence, but had the House no power on this occasion? It had, indeed, often carried its privileges to a great length against the rights and liberties of the people, but it had seldom exercised them against the Crown, and, least of all, against the law officers of the Crown. He had been too long a member of that House to entertain any hope that they would exercise their powers to compel Mr. Attorney to lay the grounds of his opinion before them; but he humbly thought that they ought to see those grounds; and though he would not persuade the House to take such steps as would oblige him to produce them, still he had no doubt that they possessed the power. But if it would be a breach of confidence in Mr. Attorney to disclose the grounds of his opinion, how much greater was the breach of confidence which the Secretary of State had committed, by stripping the opinion of those grounds? He really thought that these gentlemen in office did not act fairly towards each other. (Hear, hear.) Upon the whole, it was his opinion, that nothing would tend more effectually to lower the character of that House in the minds of the people, than the rejection of the motion which had been so ably brought before it. (Hear, hear.)

The Solicitor-General said, he could assure the hon. baronet that his mind was wholly unbiassed and unfettered upon the subject, and he had no doubt whatever of the soundness of the opinion which the law officers had given. If that opinion were correct, he must confess that he had heard no argument to convince him that the interference of the Secretary of State had been unprecedented or unconstitutional. Had we never found that proclamations had been issued (Hear, hear, hear, from the Opposition.) to call the attention of magistrates to the state of the country? And was any thing more common than for judges at the various assizes, to point out to juries what the law was? This circular letter did nothing more; it merely reminded the magistracy of what was the law of the land. Was it to be tolerated that publications of a nature tending to insurrection were not to be noticed by magistrates? Were we to wait till the sessions came round, or till the Attorney-General could file an ex-officio information? The opinion stated, that the Secretary of State, the judges, and justices of the peace, have power to commit; with respect to the two former, the right was admitted by his learned friend who opened this question. Now it would be an anomaly in the law that the Secretary of State, who had no power to examine on oath, should possess this power, and that justices of the peace should not have it. He could not help stating the singularity of the argument on this occasion. In Mr. Wilkes's time, the argument was, that the Secretary of State was not a justice of the peace, and so he had not this power; now, the argument was—Oh yes, the Secretary of State has the power, but the justice of peace has not. No lawyer could read the decision of Lord Camden, in Mr. Wilkes's case, without being of opinion that he thought justices of the peace possessed the power. The only doubt that he had was, whether the Secretary of State had the power. The view which he (the Solicitor-General) took of the question, was fully confirmed by the opinion of Hawkins, who held, that justices of the peace were bound to hear and determine all offences. That authority, however, did not extend to forgeries and perjury, but to every offence that tended to a breach of the peace, as libels and the like. Lord Kenyon, in the case of the King and Dekin, in adverting to this opinion, remarked, that he was not satisfied with the exception of forgery and perjury; and, in the case of the King and Sommers, it was decided, that the magistrates in session had jurisdiction with regard to such offences, not because they were breaches of the peace, but because they had a tendency to its breach. Hence he inferred, that in the case of libel also, magistrates had a similar power, though not expressly given to them either by statute, or the terms of the commission. Libel, it must be recollected, was an offence at common law, long before the institution of the Star-chamber; the reference which had been made to that court, therefore, in the course of this discussion, had nothing to do with the point in question, and seemed to have been introduced rather for the purpose of exciting prejudice, than adding to the force of the argument on the other side. He must, however, repeat, that neither the statutes nor the commission, gave magistrates the power of committing for libel; but they had the power of trying; and it would be a manifest absurdity to suppose, that they should have that jurisdiction, and yet not be able to put offenders in a state to be brought to trial.—It was said, that this doctrine invested magistrates with too great a power; but in fact, it gave them no greater authority than they possessed in every other crime, whether murder, robbery, perjury, or any felony. In all charges, the magistrate must exercise his own judgment in determining whether the act complained of came under any certain description of offence. But it was said, this power ought not to be given in libel: those who insisted most on this exemption, were afraid that the liberty of the press would suffer by such a jurisdiction. A valued the liberty of the press as highly as any one, but there must be modes of bringing the offences of the press, as well as other offences, (under the cognizance of the law. What magical quality did libel possess, that the practice with respect to it, should differ from that followed in regard to other crimes? In any actual breach of the peace, the magistrates had power to commit as well as in cases of felony. This power, indeed, was not expressly given them in terms, but it emanated from their authority. He challenged any man in the House to say, what statute specified libel as an offence, for it was well known to belong to common law, and as such, to be punished. If, then, the magistrates can commit for felony, why not for libel? because, by having such power, they did no more than they did in a thousand other cases. A magistrate, in committing for a crime, exercised his discretion, well knowing that a jury had to decide on the case, and why should he not do the same in the instance of libel?—Since the cognizance of magistrates over a libel in session, a jurisdiction which was not now questioned, had been established, he would contend that they possessed that jurisdiction also out of session; this opinion was supported by the authority of Lord Hale. An argument had been held in another place (call of order): he supposed he was in order in alluding to that argument, as it had been published. The argument of the noble earl, which he brought forward towards the end of his speech, and regarded as triumphant, was in substance this—that no cases in which magistrates had committed for offences, which were not a breach of the peace, had been brought under the cognizance of courts of law. In alluding to the case of the King against Rispal, (see p. 1022.) in which conspiracy was held to be cognizable at sessions, like cheats and libels, the noble earl argued—

Here Mr. Bennet rose, and called the hon. and learned gentleman to order.

The Speaker said, it was not parliamentary to allude to what passed in the other House of Parliament; it was, however, the practice to allow any printed publication to be referred to: the circumstance of that publication having been delivered in another place might lead to a deviation from order, in commenting upon it.

Mr. Wynn thought there was considerable inconvenience in referring to a speech spoken in the other House of Parliament, even though it was printed. There was no knowing whither such a practice might lead.

Sir F. Burdett said, if the publication was alluded to as a written argument, not as a speech spoken, he apprehended no objection could be offered to it. (Hear, hear.)

The Solicitor-General said, that the same argument had been used in substance that night. Leaving it aside, however, he would just mention a case which he believed was decisive as to the point in question: it was the case of Holliday

v. Oxenbridge, in Croke's Reports*. An action was brought for false imprisonment. The defence was, that the party had been taken playing with false dice, and carried before a magistrate, who would have committed him, but bail was given. Stripping this case of all special pleadings, it was a complete answer to all that had been said on the other side. The offence committed was no breach of the peace, but a cheat at common law. If, therefore, this jurisdiction was exercised in a case of common cheat, why should it not in an offence of a much higher nature? for such he was entitled to describe libel to be, on the authority of Lord Camden. The answer afforded by this case was the more complete, as it had been brought before the Court of King's Bench, to be argued on demurrer, and the defence had been allowed. When the bill was introduced into Parliament for regulating the law of libel, it was never argued that that offence should have any particular privilege. All that was contended for was, that it should be put on the same footing as other offences, and that the jury should therefore be made judges of the law, as well as the fact. It had been said, that usage did not make law: but would any one suppose, that when persons were brought up to the Court of King's Bench, to give bail for offences, that the Court took no notice of the grounds on which the bail was demanded? In such cases, the Court could not overlook the grounds of the commitment, as was done in the case of general warrants. Having thus established—first, that libel was an offence cognizable by magistrates, and secondly, that being cognizable by them, they had a right to commit for it, in default of bail—he conceived that he had made out his case. As to the right of the Secretary of State to call the attention of the magistracy to certain offences, it was only what had frequently been done by Proclamation, and by judges at the opening of an assize. He was astonished to hear his hon. and learned friend introduce so long a history of attorneys and solicitors-general, as if to assimilate the proceedings of his hon. and learned friend near him, and himself, with the proceedings which he condemned. There might be an imputation against the heads of his hon. and learned friend near him, and himself, but there could be none against their hearts. They had discharged their duty to the best of their ability; and in so doing, he denied that they had introduced any new law. He had now given his opinion on the question before the House, and stated, though feebly he was aware, the reasons on which that opinion was founded. (The hon. and learned gentleman sat down amidst loud cheering.)

Mr. G. Wynn complimented the last speaker on his able construction of the law, and expressed his conviction, that that was the only construction which could be put upon it. He was the more satisfied of this, by the consideration of what had passed in Wilkes's case, and the judgment given by Lord Camden. Every offence, and the greatest the law knew, was subject to be decided on, as to commitment, by a single magistrate. A man might write to another abroad, that he was to send him six bales of cloth, and four of cotton: this was innocent: but if the bales of cloth meant ships of the line, and the cotton frigates, and the letter was written to give information to an enemy, the offence was treason, and a magistrate might commit the writer. With respect to the other part of the case, he considered that the Secretary of State possessed the right of directing magistrates, as the head and superintendent of the police of the country; but then, he ought to give the directions on his own responsibility, and not on that of the Attorney and Solicitor-General. He never knew an instance in which the law-officers of the Crown had been so called upon to expound the law, except that of the Volunteer bill, and that had not been so successful as to render it desirable as a precedent. Lord Sidmouth's Circular had, besides, been addressed to the lords lieutenants of counties, which was a further impropriety. The lord lieutenant being a military officer, ought not to have been made the medium of such a communication.

Sir S. Romilly, in reply, expressed his surprise, that none of the members of administration, with the exception of his learned friend, and the hon. and learned gentleman who spoke last but one, had delivered their opinion on this question. Their allowing it to go thus silently to a decision, shewed the little value they set on questions of importance to the liberty of the subject.—Nothing had been said in answer to the objections which had been urged on constitutional grounds. His hon. friend seemed to think that he was only called on to justify himself against a particular charge, and the same view appeared to have been taken by the Solicitor-General. The question, however, had not been brought forward with a view to censure any individual, but to shew the impropriety and danger of publishing law on the authority of any Attorney or Solicitor-General whatever. He lamented the absence of his hon. friend (Sir A. Pigott) from severe indisposition, who had expressed a most decided opinion upon this subject. He (Sir S. R.) denied having imputed any misconduct to the Attorney or Solicitor-General, or of entertaining the least intention to degrade offices, one of which he had himself held. Still, the Attorney and Solicitor-General were only the King's advocates, and not the judges of the law; and although the present holders of those offices might be, and were, men of the utmost probity, who should say that in future times, such Attorneys-General as Noy (whom even Lord Clarendon had condemned as having been influenced to declare that for law, which he believed, or knew not to be law), might not be found, to be the tools, and not the honest advisers of Ministers? It appeared that the Secretary of State had published the opinion of the law-officers without their knowledge; and this conduct appeared to be such a gross breach of confidence, that had it happened to him, he should have thought it his duty to tender his resignation.—The hon. and learned member then entered into the law of the case, insisting that the answer, even upon that point, had been almost as defective as it had been upon the constitutional part of the question. It had been said, that the magistrate was only empowered to commit for a time; but was it not necessary that he should first form an opinion upon the paper, whether it were or were not a libel; and if he decided in the affirmative, did it not entail upon the unhappy culprit many of the worst consequences of conviction; dragging him away from his family and his business, and burying him in a dungeon? The authority of Lord Hale had been relied upon as completely decisive, that the magistrates had the power to commit in cases of libel; but it was singular, that those who quoted him, should have omitted a most important passage, in which the same learned judge expressed a doubt as to the opinion he had previously stated on certain text-books, to which he had referred. In conclusion, the hon. and learned member took occasion to censure that part of the circular of Lord Sidmouth, which directed prosecutions against the sellers of pamphlets, under the Hawkers' and Pedlars' Act, upon which, it appeared, only one magistrate had ventured to proceed, and he had been compelled to make compensation to the party injured. He denied that the Circular of the Secretary of State had the least resemblance to a Proclamation, or to the customary address of a judge on opening an assize. The Proclamation of 1793, for instance, only enforced the existing law. In the case under the consideration of the House, there had been a declaration of law perfectly new. He should, therefore, take the sense of the House on the first Resolution, which he intended to propose, and which he had before described. (Hear, hear.)

The motion for the Address was negatived, without a division.—The House then divided on the first Resolution—

The second Resolution was negatived without a division.

[IRISH MISCELLANEOUS SERVICES.] In a Committee of Supply, the following sums were voted for Irish Miscellaneous Services.—1. A sum, not exceeding 40,000*l.* sterling, being 43,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Irish currency nett, "for defraying Civil Contingencies in Ireland, for the year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—2. A sum, not exceeding 22,543*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* sterling, being 41,559*l.* Irish, "for defraying the expense of supporting the Protestant Schools of Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th Jan. 1818."—3. A sum, not exceeding 9,233*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* sterling, being 9,273*l.* Irish, "for defraying the charge of the Roman Catholic Seminary, for one year, ending the 24th Jan. 1818."—4. A sum, not exceeding 11,076*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* sterling, being 12,000*l.* Irish, "for defraying the expense of the external Establishment of the Royal Hospital at Kilmalsham, for the year ending the 24th Dec. 1817."—5. A sum, not exceeding 4,000*l.* sterling nett, "for the Board of Inland Navigation in Ireland."

CHAPELS BUILDING BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his bill to authorize the building of Chapels, which was read a first time and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 26.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS.] Lord Melville gave notice for to-morrow of his intention to present a Bill respecting the Administration of Oaths to Naval and Military Officers in certain cases.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] This Bill was brought up from the Commons by Sir J. Nicholl and other Members. It was read a first time, when

The Lord Chancellor observed, that as it had come up so late in the Session, he trusted those Spiritual Lords who were in town would make a point of attending its discussion.

TITHES LEASING BILL.] This Bill was read a first time.

The Lord Chancellor said, it did not appear that this measure had been brought forward in consequence of any communication with the Right Reverend Bench, and if he did not receive some information upon the subject from some of the Right Reverend Prelates (it being impossible for the Lay Lords, at this period of the Session to attend to it), he should certainly oppose any further proceeding in the Bill.

ABOLITION, &c. BILLS.] The following bills were read a second time. The Exchequer Offices (England and Ireland) Abolition Bill.—The Exchequer Offices (England) Abolition Bill.—The Offices (Ireland) Abolition Bill.—The Justices in Eyre Abolition Bill.—The Civil Services Recompense Bill.—The Board of Trade Bill.—The Signet Clerk's Bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, June 26.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

REPEAL OF THE SEPTENNIAL ACT.] Mr. Brougham, adverting to his notice which stood for this night, to make a motion for the repeal

* The Bill did not proceed further; and, as Mr. Curwen's bill (see pages 1483, 1486—in the latter page Mr. Lockhart's name is mentioned by mistake) was read only a first time, no legislative measure was adopted during the Session on the subject of Tithes. Mr. Curwen's Bill went to enact, 1st, That an issue shall be granted upon the prayer of either plaintiff or defendant in equity suits, to try by jury any prescription, custom, manner of tithing, composition or exemption therein alleged; provided it be prayed before hearing, otherwise court to proceed as heretofore.—2dly, That where in such suits the defence arises on a composition real, it shall be sufficient to state it generally, and to prove it by usage, as in cases of moduses, without being obliged to produce the instrument of such composition, or to shew that such instrument had been actually executed.—3dly, That where discharges or exemptions from tithes are claimed under dissolved monasteries and religious houses, they may be proved by usage.—4thly, That grants and conveyances of tithes, and discharges from tithes, shall be presumed against lay impropriators, from length of enjoyment.—5thly, That conveyances, exchanges, compositions, &c. made between the 13th Eliz. and the year 1766, shall be valid, unless proved to have been fraudulently obtained.—6thly, When conveyances, exchanges, compositions, &c. are set aside, pecuniary compensations to cease, and lands to be restored to the right owners upon petition, if discovered within 20 years, and in the mean time to be vested in the overseers of the poor for the benefit of the poor, and if not discovered within 20 years, to go absolutely to the poor, and overseers not to be answerable to owners for misde profits.—7thly, The Court, on petition, to order lands to be given up to the overseers or owners, as the case may require, and if necessary, commissions to be issued to ascertain the same, or set out an equivalent.—8thly, Where conveyances, exchanges, compositions, &c. are set aside, no rector, &c. to recover tithes or lands, but from the time of giving up the compensations.—9thly, Moduses and compositions not to be avoided for want of precisely ascertaining lands covered thereby, but commissions to be issued to ascertain the same, or set out lands equivalent to secure the same, and remedy by distress and sale given for pecuniary compensations and compositions.—10thly, Where moduses, compositions, or exemptions are informally alleged, the Court may direct them in proper form.—Parishes praying issues, to be liable to treble costs, if Judges shall certify they were frivolous and vexatious.

of the Septennial Act, intimated his intention of postponing it until the next Session—not that he did not feel the urgency and importance of the measure; but that, having delayed it from inevitable circumstances until so late a period of the Session, he felt that it would not be fair towards a question of such magnitude, to bring it forward when the attendance of Members was likely to be so scanty, and when those who remained were perhaps not perfectly disposed to turn their minds to it.—He gave a general notice therefore, that very early in the next Session—long, he hoped, before the Easter Holidays—he should make a motion on the subject. (Hear, hear.)

NAVAL PRIZE MONEY.] Mr. Brougham presented a petition of Dennis Sullivan, late a seaman in his Majesty's service, and now in Mount-street workhouse. It appeared that this man, after having spent his whole life in the service, and being a complete cripple, was unable to obtain his pension from the Sick and Hurt Office, although he had the highest testimonials of character from officers of the first respectability, merely because, through ignorance or neglect, he had omitted to procure his smart ticket, within the exact period prescribed by the rules of the service, and it was now too late to require it. In addition to this, he had been treated with great harshness and insolence by the inferior officers at the Admiralty; and had no hope of redress but from Parliament, as the strict rule of the service was with the Admiralty.

Sir G. Warrender complained that the hon. gentleman had not communicated with him previously to presenting the petition, as it was admitted that the Admiralty were right in point of form. He could only say, that no branch of that department was attended to with so much care and anxiety as the pensions to wounded seamen; their applications had been listened to at the most irregular times.

Mr. Brougham replied, that he had cast no imputation on the hon. gentleman. He complained of the conduct of the lower servants of the Admiralty, whom he had properly forborne to name. Lord Thurlow had said, he would never name a delinquent in office, because, if he did, he must be condemned to hear the panegyric, not only of the individual named, but of every person in the whole department. He (Mr. B.) should now, however, name the individuals he had alluded to. They were Mr. Dyer, and the under porters.

Sir J. Newport thought the case worthy of consideration; a distressed and deserving seaman ought not to be the victim of forms of office.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, he had inquired into the subject, and could bear testimony to the truth of the whole petition. It was then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FINANCES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.] Mr. Tierney rose and said, he could not find any mode by which the difference between the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself, with respect to the financial situation of the country, could be made so intelligible to the House, as by moving certain resolutions which he had prepared. By the Budget, he was apprized of the views of the right hon. gentleman, and it seemed to him but fair that the right hon. gentleman should be apprized of his, previous to a discussion on the subject. It was merely his wish to move these Resolutions, with a view of having them printed, and to adjourn the debate to a future occasion. The right hon. gentleman presented the following four resolutions:—

I.

That it appears to this House, by the Report of the Committee of Finance, that the sum to be expended by the commissioners, for the redemption of the funded debt of Great Britain and Ireland, in the year 1817, may be estimated at.....	£ 14,515,080
And that provision has been made for paying off navy and transport debt, within the same period, to the amount of.....	1,660,000
Making the sum applicable to the reduction of debt in the year 1817	16,175,080

That it appears to this House, that the amount of the unfunded debt of Great Britain, in Exchequer Bills outstanding and unprovided for, has been increased, since the 5th of Jan. 1817, by the sum of.....	7,698,950
That a further issue of Exchequer bills to the amount of.....	£ 9,000,000
And of Treasury Bills in Ireland.....	3,600,000 has been voted for the service of the year 1817.....	12,600,000

Making an increase of debt in 1817	20,498,950
And that, deducting the sum before voted, as applicable to the reduction of debt.....	16,175,080
The debt of Great Britain and Ireland (exclusive of any deficiency which may arise in the income of and charge upon the Consolidated Fund) will be increased, in the year 1817, by the sum of.....	4,323,870

II.

That, supposing the income of and charge upon the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland to be the same in the year ending the 5th of January, 1818, as in the year ended 5th of January, 1817, they may be stated as follows:—

Income—Great Britain (after deducting 374,000 l. , arrears of property-tax) App. A. 1, 4th Report Committee Finance.....	38,709,551
Do, Ireland; App. E. 1, ditto.....	4,394,631

Income of year ending 5th of January, 1818 43,104,182

Charge—Great Britain; App. B. 1, 4th Report Com- mittee of Fi- nance	£39,693,429
No. Ireland; App. F. 1, 2, and 3, ditto, ditto. . .	6,985,953
Charge of year ending 5th of Jan. 1818	46,625,382
Deficiency of consolidated fund, 5th Jan. 1818	3,521,200

III.

That it appears to this House, that comparing the net produce of the Customs and Excise of Great Britain, in the first 22 weeks of 1816, with the first 22 weeks of 1817, there is a diminution of receipt, in the latter period, of. . .

IV.

That the unfunded debt of Great Britain and Ire- land, unprovided for, may be stated as follows; viz.
Amount of Exchequer Bills in Great Britain, outstanding and unprovided for, 20th June, 1817	52,362,200
Farther amount of Exchequer Bills voted for the service of 1817.	9,000,000
Amount of Treasury Bills (Ireland) unprovided for, on the 5th Jan. 1817	5,304,992
Amount of Treasury Bills (Ireland) voted for the service of 1817.	3,600,000
Amount of unfunded debt (exclusive of any deficiency in the income of and charge upon the Consolidated Fund) to be provided for, 5th Jan. 1818	70,267,192

The first resolution having been put,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he perfectly coincided with the right hon. gentleman's mode of proceeding. Any comments upon his statement would come more properly at a future time. He then moved to adjourn the debate till Tuesday next, which was agreed to.

VERDICT OF A JURY.] Sir F. Burdett said, he rose to present a petition, which involved considerations of the highest importance, not only to the individual, but also to the general course of justice. It was the petition of Mr. Thomas Jonathan Wooler, author and printer of a publication called The Black Dwarf, at present in confinement in the King's Bench Prison. The petition stated the number of hardships which Mr. Wooler had undergone. In the first place, he was taken up and committed to prison on an ex officio information filed by the Attorney-General, and thus underwent a considerable punishment before he was brought to trial. He was committed under an act brought in by Sir Vicary Gibbs, which he (Sir F. B.) had been informed, was originally intended for the purpose of preventing revenue-debtors from absconding. The petitioner stated, that two ex officio informations had been filed against him. When he was brought to trial, it was impossible for him to know on which of them he was first to be tried; of course he could not be so well prepared with his defence, as, under other circumstances, he might have been. On that information which was last filed, contrary to his expectation, he was first brought to trial. So much irregularity had taken place on the part of the judge, in receiving the verdict, that he had put the individual tried in a very extraordinary predicament. In the first place, which was certainly rather a hasty mode of proceeding, the Judge received the verdict before the whole of the Jury were in Court. He (Sir F. B.) happened to be in Court at the time, and he could see only the Foreman of the Jury. The Foreman, in answer to a question from Judge Abbot, whether the verdict was guilty or not? said, "The verdict was guilty; but some of us wished to say so and so." The verdict, however, was recorded. A very short time had elapsed before it was whispered in Court, that the Jury were not agreed on the verdict; and it was impossible such a verdict could be received, as the Jury were not in view of the Judge at the time, and they were not asked by the officer whether they were all agreed. The verdict was hastily taken without any question; and if it were possible for any one to suspect a Judge of entrapping a verdict for political purposes, he would suppose him acting in a similar way. It was entrapping by precipitancy; because, though the Foreman said guilty, yet he accompanied this with other words, which evidently shewed that there was a difference of opinion among them; and some explanation ought to have taken place. It was incumbent on the Judge to desire the Jury to go into their box, and then to ask them whether they were agreed. But this was not done, and the verdict of guilty was recorded. When the circumstance of a difference of opinion among the Jurors was first stated to the Court, the Judge ought to have inquired if the Jurors were or were not separated?—and if not separated, they ought to have been sent back to consider the verdict. It appeared that three of the Jurymen were not agreed—that special reasons were given by them, on the condition that if those reasons were not received they did not agree to the verdict. Of this, affidavits were subsequently added, but they were not received.—And why were they not received? After a great deal of argument had been used, much ability displayed by the Counsel employed on the occasion, and many precedents quoted of the reception of affidavits of Jurymen in former times, it was decided that they could not be received, because a new trial had been granted. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Justice Holroyd, than whom a more conscientious and independent Judge never sat on the Bench; stated, that the affidavits could not be received after such a Rule.—In this case Mr. Wooler had no opportunity of arguing why the Rule should not be granted. The Court made the Rule in the first instance, and then made the Rule a reason why he was deprived of that to which, according to every principle of justice and equity, he was entitled. But affidavits had also been made by persons who were standing in Court, one of whom stated, that one of the Jury disagreed in a tone sufficiently audible, and that only four Jurors appeared at the time. Mr. Justice Abbott, however, found that he had got himself into considerable difficulty in this case. He had received a verdict on which sentence could not be passed, and at the same time Mr. Wooler was under confinement till he should be delivered in due course of law: he could not be delivered till sentence was passed, and yet the verdict was so vitiated, that no Court could venture to pass sentence on him. It was somewhat singular, that, in an early part of our history, the same number of three Jurymen disagreed as to a verdict, when the Judge thought proper to continue the proceedings, and had the misfortune to get hanged. This was to be found in the Mirror of Justices. But, in the present case, the matter was carried still farther than was done by Justice Cambden—he put in other three Jurors, and the cause was tried over again. But what was now doing in this case? Mr. Wooler was to be tried again by twelve fresh Jurymen. The first twelve were his only legal tribunal; and yet the Court now ruled that not three fresh men, but twelve fresh men should be taken.—Now this was a violation of the first principle of common law, that a man could not be twice in danger for the same offence. There was another instance in the same valuable book, The Mirror, of a Judge who was so unfortunate as to get hanged, because he passed sentence in a case where the Jury were doubtful; for, as the Mirror said, where there is any doubt, there ought always to be an acquittal. The whole of the circumstances in this case ought to operate as an acquittal of Mr. Wooler. Mr. Wooler contended that there was no trial, as there was no proper verdict, and, therefore, that there could be no rule for a new trial. But taking the case in the other point of view, that there had been a trial and a verdict, he (Sir F. B.) would set the Court at defiance to proceed upon it. Indulgence had been talked of, but indulgence was not a word for courts of justice; it was strict justice, and nothing more nor less, that was wanted there. Mr. Wooler might be a man of too firm a mind to accept the advice of those who were sometimes said to be of counsel for the prisoner. (Hear, hear.) The Court, however, pressed its advice, which he declined taking. The Court acted something like Squire Western (in Tom Jones), who, wanting to press his daughter to a disagreeable match, said, “I’ll break her heart, but I’ll make her happy!” Now, if Mr. Wooler were to a new trial by a new jury, improper advantages were afforded to the prosecutors. Tried already by twelve men before whom he had put himself, he was to be tried again by twelve others. Might not the plea of autrefois convict be sufficient? He should be inclined to take that course; and to leave the Judges to do what they pleased. Besides, there was conclusive evidence for this by the recording of the verdict. If Mr. Wooler stood on the verdict, he would be equally out of reach as if he had been acquitted. All the inconveniences arose not only from false steps, but from the over hastiness of the judge. It seemed the imperious duty of the House to consider the situation of the petitioner under these circumstances. It might, probably, be incumbent on him to move something beyond presenting the petition. This, however, must be the preliminary step. He saw nothing in the petition that was not highly proper for the House to hear.

The petition was then brought up and read. It stated the circumstances nearly the same as in the hon. baronet’s speech. It represented the petitioner as author and publisher of the Black Dwarf; that he had been confined five weeks in prison, on a warrant from Lord Ellenborough, for certain libels; that he was originally promised all indulgence and liberality by the Crown-officers; but was afterwards refused a copy of the information against him, unless he paid for it at the rate of eighteen pence per folio; but that it was so long, and so redundant with words, that it would have cost him several pounds, which he was neither able nor willing to pay. This demand he thought contrary to Magna Charta, which said, “Justice shall not be sold.” Thus he was precluded from the means of a full and fair defence. He was then called on for a second trial. His first jury came back during the second trial, but waited till the Attorney-General had done speaking. Four of them appeared: they said guilty, but three wished to assign special reasons, which the judge refused, though he took the verdict of guilty. He complained of the precipitancy of the Judge, who, contrary to law, recorded the said verdict. On one charge he was acquitted; on another he yet remained at the vindictive pleasure of the Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General rose. He said, he never was more astonished in his life than at the statement he had just heard, because, with respect to a great many of the facts in the petition, they were altogether without foundation: he spoke of the part more particularly which alluded to himself, if he was meant in what was said respecting the communication with the Attorney-General. He undertook to state, that, unless his memory of past transactions was gone, he never had had any personal communication with Mr. Wooler, or any agent on his behalf: nor did he ever see him, till he appeared in Court. But if such a communication had been made to him, he would have told Mr. Wooler, that the same proceeding must be observed in his case which was observed in all others. All the communication he had with him was giving him notice that his trial would come on, of course, after the Easter Term, that, as he had pleaded, he might not say he was kept in custody till the sittings after Trinity Term. (Hear, hear.) It was stated, that the second trial had been pressed on him; but the fact was, that so far from being unwilling, when he (the Attorney-general) was looking over some papers, and pausing in the business, Wooler's attorney desired him to proceed, adding that, if there were not enough special jurymen present, talesmen could be called. So far was it from being true that he had forced on the second trial. (Hear, hear.) Indeed, in his speech to the jury, Mr. Wooler made a sort of triumph that he (the Attorney-general) had paused so long before he proceeded with the second trial.—The learned gentleman said, he now stood forward to justify the law, and the mode in which it was administered. Nothing had been done but what the law required and warranted. There were some peculiarities in the construction of the court. There was a space partitioned off behind the judges, through which the jury pass. They might not all come perfectly into view, but their names were all called over by the officer, and 12 voices answered, "Here." When the officer of the Court asked, guilty or not guilty? The foreman answered guilty: but stated at the same time, that he had a paper in his hands. He undertook, on his honour, to say that he never had had the slightest communication with any of the jury, he knew not even the faces of any of them, he knew only that the foreman was Mr. Powell, a respectable merchant in the city. When the officer asked, guilty or not guilty, the foreman, looking at a paper which he held in his hands, answered "guilty; but three of the jury wish to give reasons." The answer of the judge was, "I shall receive any thing which comes unanimously from the jury; but I cannot receive particular reasons from particular jurymen. What is your verdict?" The answer was, "my Lord, we find the defendant guilty." If those behind him were not all in court, they must have heard what the verdict was, from the symptoms which were manifested in court on its being declared. When the question was asked, is that your verdict? the answer returned was, yes, on which it was recorded. Three quarters of an hour passed, and after the greater part of the jury were gone, after the defendant's solicitor had been out of court, and had conferred with one of the jury, then, and not before, it was stated, that the jury were not unanimous in their verdict. It had been laid down by all the authorities, that when a verdict had once been recorded, it could not be altered or retracted; the judge therefore said, that nothing could be done there, meaning that application must be made to the Court out of which the record had issued. It appeared to him (the Attorney-general) most marvellous, if the jury had not agreed in their verdict, that those who dissented should not have stopped their fellows.

They knew that some verdict had been given, and that it was not an acquittal, as nine of the jury were in favour of a verdict of guilty absolutely. On the following day, being the first day of term, the learned judge felt it his duty to state the circumstances in court*. He (the Attorney-general) suggested that the fact should be made out in some manner by the affidavits of the by-standers. The Court then said, that if there was a doubt whether all the jury were within the view of the Court, a new trial would be granted on the application of the party, on which he, in the character of the advocate of the Crown, anxious that not the least injustice should be done, begged a new trial. The attorney of Mr. Wooler objected to this, and wished either a verdict for an acquittal, or a trial by the same jury. Could he reasonably demand a verdict of acquittal, when nine men were for returning an absolute verdict of guilty, and three merely for adding their reasons? If the verdict had taken its course, and it had appeared that the Court could not pass judgment on it, the course would have been to award a venire de novo, which is a new trial by another jury. When any mistake occurred, Lord Coke and all others agreed that such a new trial must be granted. Yet Mr. Wooler complained that he was used with hardship, because he had been treated according to every principle of law, and objected to that which was awarded him ex debito justitiæ. He, therefore, contended, that the complaints of the petition were unfounded, that some of the statements to which it referred were untrue, and that it could only have been intended to bring the administration of justice into contempt.

Mr. Ponsonby said, the Attorney-General knew as well as he did, that forms were of the essence of justice. He would therefore ask the learned gentleman, whether the judge did, in the usual form, ask the jury, 1st, if they were agreed, and then, who was their foreman?

The Attorney-General replied, that the officer, generally speaking, put those questions. He thought it was not common for all the jury to answer. In this case, the officer having called over the names of the jurors, asked if they were agreed, and he could not say whether any answer was returned. To the question, what was their verdict? the foreman replied "Guilty, but—" when the learned judge said he could receive no reasons, but merely their unanimous verdict. The clerk again asked, what was their verdict, when the foreman replied "Guilty." The judge then said, "Is that your verdict?" The foreman replied, "Yes." This was his recollection of the proceeding, and he believed he was never more correct in his life. He should be extremely happy to answer any questions that might be put to him on the subject.

* The Court of King's Bench at Westminster. Mr. Wooler was tried in the Court of King's Bench at Guildhall, June 5th.

Lord Althorpe thought that the Attorney-General, by proving too much, had proved nothing. (Hear, hear.) If the proceedings were so accurate, why was a new trial necessary? (Hear, hear.) He would not pretend to enter into the question as a lawyer; but it struck him as very unfortunate that any thing should thus happen which could be represented as distressing to the prisoner. All he knew of the case was from the public journals; from them it appeared, that the foreman's reply to the question of the judge, whether that was their verdict, was, "Yes, but—;" and that the judge, having prevented any explanation, immediately received the verdict. (Hear, hear.) This did not appear right: nothing was of greater importance than that the administration of justice, especially in such cases as the present, should be free from all appearance of precipitancy. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lockhart thought the hon. Baronet (Sir F. Burdett), from his known candour and manliness, should not have insinuated that the worthy judge was disposed to catch at a verdict of guilty. The judge seemed to him to have acted with the greatest fairness.

Mr. Ponsonby asked, whether a new trial was ordered, and upon what grounds, and what had taken place in the second conversation with the jury, or their foreman?

The Attorney-General replied, that a new trial was certainly granted, or ordered, if they would have it so. The reasons were, that the jury were not in court. Mr. Wooler, on a subsequent day, as far as he could collect, called for a judgment of acquittal, or demanded that he should be again tried by the same jury. It was answered that a new trial must be instituted, and that the old jury were never admitted in a venire de novo. As to the second conversation, the whole proceeding was thus:—While the jury had never gone away, the judge had interrupted the foreman by saying, "I cannot receive reasons upon either a general or specific verdict," and then asked, "What is your verdict?" and again asked, "Is that your verdict?" The answer was simply, "Yes."

Mr. Brougham wished to know whether there was any truth in the statement, that when the foreman for the last time was asked whether guilty was the verdict, he answered "Yes," and then added "But." The answer of the learned judge in the first part of the conversation was the only one that could be given: but in the second, when he asked, "Is that your verdict?" he wished to know whether the answer was, "Yes, but"—

The Attorney-General said, that the word "but" was not used that he recollected.

The Solicitor-General never heard the word, "but," on that occasion.

Mr. Brougham was perfectly satisfied with the explanation of his two learned friends. When the Attorney-general said he did not recollect the word, he must be understood to say that he had not heard it, for he could not have forgotten it. He (Mr. B.) did not mean to condemn the learned judge for what had occurred; but it was his paramount duty, when so grave and important a matter as the administration of justice, and in cases of libel, was discussed, to give his opinion; his opinion he would therefore give; he hoped it would be an impartial, it certainly would be an unbiassed, opinion. Passing over the representation of Mr. Wooler as by no means correct, for if credit was to be given to the Attorney-general, and, from a long knowledge of him, he had every reason to believe his statement, the assertion of Mr. Wooler, that he was obliged, after having been exhausted, to go into another trial, was incorrect, as the immediate succession of the other trial was of his own seeking.

The Attorney-General said, he was certainly going on with the other trial, but Mr. Wooler's attorney seeing him pause, and believing that he was not ready to go on, sent him a note demanding a warrant for proceeding immediately. He wished he had kept the note, but it was impossible for him to keep all such papers.

Mr. Brougham said, he understood the Attorney-General quite well. Though the solicitor wrote the note, Mr. Wooler took credit with the jury for greater readiness to proceed than the prosecutors shewed. This was quite irreconcilable with the charge in the petition, that he was hurried on while exhausted with the other trial. Such a contradiction affected the credit of the whole petition. He wished so dishonourable a contradiction could be explained, as he did not like to charge any one beyond strict necessity; but he could not see how it could be explained. But how stood the case upon the Attorney-General's own statement; and his and the hon. baronet's (who was likewise present) were substantially the same? He imputed no blame to the learned judge who presided. God forbid that he should say he fished for a verdict of guilty, and was a time-serving judge, who lent himself to political purposes, who regarded something else besides the approbation of his own conscience, and who suited his conduct to the views of another Court. God forbid he should say so, for the facts did not serve so far. But he could not help regretting, that the Judge did not on the first mention of any difference of opinion call for a full explanation. The jury were not in sight—he knew that as well then as afterwards. If the learned gentleman on the other side had not explained that part of the subject, he would say, that what the noble lord had said, that the Attorney-General had proved nothing by proving too much, was true. But when a qualified verdict was offered, or, not to say qualified, when an irregular addition was offered, when it appeared that three jurors wished to give reasons for their concurrence, he lamented that the judge did not instantly say, "Gentlemen of the jury, if any difference of opinion exists among you, retire again to your room, for this is the only time to correct it, as the Court can receive only a simple and unanimous verdict." (Hear, hear.) The questions, Have you agreed? Who is your foreman? were all formalities, and none but the foreman ever made any answer to those questions, he would venture to say, from the time of King Alfred. After what had passed, it was the duty of the learned judge to learn whether the jury were unanimous. He must have known the importance of that then, as well as 24 hours afterwards. When a common verdict of guilty was given in, the judge does not put two questions, such as were put in this case. From his putting them it was manifest that the judge felt himself compelled to say something unusual. What, then, was the meaning of putting those two extraordinary unusual questions? In a matter that forced such questions he ought to have made himself perfectly sure of the unanimity of the jury. Another reason, why he must regret the proceeding was, that Mr. Justice Abbott was not satisfied with the verdict, but of himself reported the occurrence to the Court: his report was candid and ingenuous, but the making such report admitted the uncertainty as to the jurors having all concurred, and caused regret that that uncertainty was not removed at once. He conceived nothing to be more important than that criminal prosecutions, and especially on the part of the State, for libel, should be conducted with perfect adherence to all the forms of justice. If any thing appeared to have been hastily done, it ought to be openly thrown out, and canvassed in that House, which always held the superintendence of the administration of justice. In this case nothing appeared that could cast a shade of suspicion upon the judge.

The Solicitor-General said, the reason why Mr. Justice Abbott reported the case to the other judges was, that a gentleman had stated in court, three quarters of an hour after the verdict had been recorded, that all the jurors had not concurred. The report was made, because all the jurors were not in court, and there was, therefore, a possibility that they had not all heard the verdict. The impression on his mind, and on that of the judge, at the time was, that all the jurors heard the verdict, and concurred in it. But as there was a possibility that they did not hear it, a new trial was granted, and it was not attempted to conclude the prisoner under the verdict of guilty, recorded. He did not hear any one of the jury express a dissent from the verdict.

Sir F. Burdett would not have said any thing farther on the subject but for an expression used by the Attorney-General as to his motives in presenting the petition. He had alleged that his intention was to bring the administration of justice into contempt. He (Sir F.) knew that Mr. Attorney-General had the power of filing informations ex officio for whatever he conceived to be a libel, but he did not know that he was entitled ex officio to utter libels against members of that House for their parliamentary conduct. He had brought in the petition from an anxiety which every honest man in this or any other country must feel, that what was administered as justice should be justice, and in acting upon that anxiety he would not be answered by imputations by Mr. Attorney-General. It was stated by the learned gentleman that the new trial was for the benefit of Mr. Wooler. He could see no advantage that Mr. Wooler was to derive from it; but it was evidently for the benefit of the judge, who had brought himself into at least an awkward predicament. He (Sir F.) saw in his conduct a hastiness ill-suited to his situation in such a case. He had said at the very time, to a gentleman near him, that it was no verdict. A rumour came almost immediately to his ears that the jury were not agreed. It was a considerable time before this was stated to the judge. He would repeat, that it could not be shewn that the new trial was for the benefit of Mr. Wooler. Mr. Justice Holroyd—and there was no judge to whose authority on that as well as on other questions the country would more readily bow (hear, hear.)—had said, that it was impossible to proceed upon that verdict; therefore, the new trial was not for the benefit of Mr. Wooler. It had been stated too, that Mr. Wooler was told that he could be discharged upon his own recognizance: he knew not how far this was true, but if it was true it made the argument still stronger.

The Attorney-General said, he had directed it to be communicated to Mr. Wooler, that as a new trial was ordered, and he was confined for want of bail, therefore, as he wished to avoid every appearance of oppression, he would accept of his own recognizance. No answer was received, but he hoped this had been communicated.

Sir F. Burdett had no doubt but this was the ground of the report, and thought it very handsome on the part of the Attorney-General. (Hear, hear.)

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.*

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of Inhabitants of Birmingham, against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—It was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition from a Society at Liverpool, called the Concentric Society, against the further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Castlereagh moved, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on the bill for continuing the Suspension.

Mr. Gurney said, that as he had voted for the former bill, because he thought it necessary, it would be a great satisfaction to him, if all persons confined in consequence, were allowed to have every comfort that was compatible with the object of their detention. From a conversation with one who had been in solitary confinement for fifteen months, he had learned that the intellect could not remain unimpaired in such circumstances more than six months. He wished, therefore, to know whether they were to be entirely debarred from intercourse or communication with their friends? He had had opportunities since the last debate of seeing persons who resided in the districts where arms were said to have been fabricated for the purposes of insurrection; and they declared that the statement was totally unfounded. When this measure was recommended to preserve the tranquillity of the country, it ought to be considered from whence disturbances were likely to arise. The country was in a situation of great distress, and was on that account more liable to be wrought upon by the turbulent and ill-designing; but how could this bill operate to preserve the public peace, when it was considered, that it would merely take the administration of the law out of the hands of the local magistrates, and place it in those of the Secretary of State? It was unfortunate, for any good practical result from this measure, that the country did not look with a very favourable eye to the late exertions of power, and that the Executive had not acquired any additional credit in the judgment of the people, or any new claim to their confidence, by its communications with such men as Castle and Oliver, or by allowing Reynolds, a State informer, to be summoned as a jurymen on the late trials.—From an attentive consideration of the Reports of the Committees of both Houses, and of what had come to his own knowledge, he could not feel satisfied in supporting the proposition of the noble lord. (Hear, hear.)

* Mr. Wooler was soon afterwards discharged on his recognizance, and no farther proceedings have been taken in the case.

Sir J. Newport objected to the measure altogether, but seeing that it was likely, notwithstanding any objections that could be made to it, to obtain the sanction of the House, he would propose a clause to render its duration as short as the assumed necessity justified. By the present provisions of the bill, it was to continue till the end of six weeks after the assembling of Parliament. This, it was evident, made its duration very indefinite, for it depended on the pleasure of the Ministers of the Crown, at what time, after a prorogation or a dissolution, they would call Parliament together. There was a rumour abroad, said to depend on the authority of a member of the Administration, that a dissolution would take place after the termination of the present session, and consequently with the Suspension Act in existence. (Hear.) If this was the case, it was difficult to say when this oppressive measure would cease. He did not wish to infringe on the prerogative of the Crown, to prorogue, to dissolve, or to call Parliaments, at its pleasure; and he would not, therefore, propose that any pledge should be required as to the time of its assembling the House; but he would move that the duration of the bill should be limited to the 1st of December, and thus make it necessary for the Crown to call Parliament together, if Ministers thought proper to prolong its date. He saw no objection to this course, which would require nothing but a pledge from Government, that if the state of the country demanded, in the opinion of Ministers, a continued suspension of the liberties of the people, the Legislature should be only assembled to examine the condition of public affairs, and to decide on the repeal or the continuance of this act, under the new circumstances which might then exist. The general appearance of things would seem to justify the expectation of an early meeting without the intervention of a positive pledge, were not the experience of the last years against it. It would be remembered, that last year the difficulties of the country were allowed to be great, yet Parliament was postponed by repeated prorogations till late in the winter. If Ministers so exercised their discretion, a meeting of Parliament might not take place till next spring; and this act, which placed the liberties of every man at their disposal, might be continued as long as they chose to exercise the powers it conferred. It should be borne in mind, that the Habeas Corpus Act was made to protect the subject against the Ministers of the Crown, and should not, therefore, be suspended at the pleasure of the Ministers. During the whole of the last century, when it was suspended, it was suspended for definite periods. If at any time it was more necessary than another that its duration should be limited, and Parliament should judge of its necessity at short intervals, it was the present, when great general distress prevailed, and it was proved that agents employed by Government had endeavoured to seduce the suffering people to the only acts that could justify an extraordinary exercise of power. That the measure should be early reconsidered appeared to be the opinion of the Committees of both Houses, for both mentioned in stronger or less pointed terms, that the tranquillity of the country was not as yet re-established, and could not, with safety, be left to depend on the ordinary laws; meaning, by such expressions, that a favourable change might soon be expected to take place. (Hear.) It had been said that our Constitution could bend to circumstances, and he would allow that the present Administration had found or made it flexible and accommodating enough. He would not, however, agree to this description of it. Its motto, in his opinion, should be frangas non flectes. If it was to be considered as in the power of Ministers, he was assured that it would never recover its former solid strength, or erect attitude, as circumstances would never be wanting to justify any encroachment, or to subject it to any alteration. The authority now given to Government by its suspension was tremendous, and ought not to be continued one moment longer than the alleged necessity required. The clause which he proposed would have the effect of terminating it on the 1st of December, or of ensuring the deliberation of Parliament on the necessity of its renewal. In formerly opposing the bill, he knew that he differed from some of his friends, whose opinion he most valued; but he believed he should have their support in any proposition that went only the length of limiting the duration of a measure they deemed necessary to the danger on which they justified it. He should, therefore, propose, "that it be an Instruction to the Committee, to limit the duration of the bill till the 1st of December next." (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, he could not concur in this proposition. In the first place he objected to it in point of form. The object could be obtained in the Committee, or the date might be altered at the third reading; and there was, therefore, no necessity for a specific instruction, which would bind up the Committee without gaining any advantage which might not otherwise be attained. He objected as much to the substance of the instruction as to the form. The right hon. baronet had spoken of the unlimited duration of the measure, from being made to depend on the meeting of Parliament, which might be dissolved at the end of the session, or prorogued to an indefinite period. He had relied on the rumour of a dissolution, of the existence of which he (Lord C.) was not aware, as he was ignorant of the authority on which it rested. The right hon. baronet could have heard nothing of a dissolution in a way to justify him in making the report of it the ground of any proposition, or the foundation of any argument in Parliament. It had never been alluded to by any Minister; no question of the kind was under deliberation. Laying this argument aside, he should consider the right hon. baronet's motion as merely proposing a short term for the expiration of the act.—He took a view of the matter different from that of the right hon. baronet, for he conceived that, if the necessity should exist in the beginning of December to continue the suspension, nothing could be more prejudicial to the interests of the country, than to call up, at so early a period, members from fulfilling their duties as magistrates, to fulfil their duties in the House. He could not conceive a more impolitic measure than to place Government in the alternative, either of calling gentlemen from the exercise of their most important local functions in the country, where they could be most useful in a time of difficulty and danger, or of losing the benefit of an act, which they should think necessary for the maintenance of public tranquillity. The right hon. baronet seemed to argue as if Ministers could postpone the meeting of Parliament as long as they chose, not considering that the Supplies and the Mutiny Act were only for a limited time. He, (Lord C.) if it was thought proper, would not object to a specific day for the expiration of the suspension; but it must be later than that proposed by the hon. baronet. If no other public business required the assembling of Parliament at so early a period, he should be acting contrary to duty, if he agreed to the right hon. baronet's proposition. Reverting to what had been stated about a dissolution of Parliament, the noble lord said, that he thought it would be extremely unconstitutional in a Minister to pledge himself as to what was to be done by the Crown.

Sir J. Newport said, that the rumour of an intended dissolution of Parliament, after the present session, depended on the authority of a noble peer high in the administration, who had declared that such a measure was in contemplation, to more than one noble peer of his (Sir J. N.'s) acquaintance.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that he could not answer for what was said by any individual; but he was not aware of any such declaration as the right hon. baronet had mentioned.

Mr. C. Wynn said, that if Providence blessed us with a plentiful harvest, of which there was now every prospect, that distress which was very properly called in the Lords' Report, the instrument of disaffection, would be taken out of the hands of the enemies of the public tranquillity, and the Suspension Act might expire on the 1st of December. Every member who supported that act, allowed that it was an evil, and that it should not be continued one hour longer than it was justified by the necessity of the case. If, therefore, the difficulties of the country, at the period mentioned, should be so mitigated or removed, as to render it unnecessary, it should then expire; but if dangers to justify its continuance should exist, much as he valued the exertions of members in their country residences, and highly as he was disposed to rate their services as magistrates, with the influence of their authority and character as country gentlemen, in their respective neighbourhoods, he thought this House would then be the proper sphere of their duties. (Hear.) It was no uncommon thing to see Parliament called before Christmas. A season of danger made an early resort to the wisdom of the Legislature more necessary.—In the rebellions of 1715 and 1745, this was the case, though the gentlemen then might have been useful in their country residences; then the Suspension Act was continued only for four months at a time. He was unwilling to trust Ministers with the liberties of the people one moment longer than necessary.

Mr. B. Bathurst objected to the motion: he contended that any instruction to the Committee on this point was unnecessary.

The cries of question became extremely loud, when Sir J. Newport rose, and after a few remarks in support of the amendment, it was negatived without a division.

The question for going into the Committee was then put by the Speaker, and was opposed by Lord Astbury, on the ground, that the arbitrary confinement of individuals had never produced any salutary political effect; and that there was no example of conspiracies against the Government of any State which had been dangerous under such circumstances.

Mr. W. Smith embraced the opportunity of passing some observations on the general state of the country, and the extent of its financial credit. The numerical amount of the national debt was not denied; but its operation on the whole system of our policy was variously represented. He could not see the wisdom of attempting to persuade other States, that the people of this country were so discontented, and the Government so weak, as to induce the necessity of the present measure.—Our foreign interests could not be much promoted by assuring the different Governments of Europe, that no reliance could be placed in this country on the affections of the people. (Hear, hear.) He thought some provision for limiting the duration of the bill clearly and indisputably necessary.

The Speaker then put the question with regard to his leaving the chair, which was carried without a division.

Sir W. Burroughs moved two amendments: the one, to confine the operation of the bill to the counties of Derby, Nottingham, Leicester, and the towns of Birmingham, Manchester, and Stockport; the other, to provide that every warrant issued by the Secretary of State, should be countersigned by the Lord Chancellor, and by others, so as to produce the signatures of six privy councillors. Both amendments were negatived without a division.

Sir J. Newport then moved, that the duration of the bill should be limited to the 1st of December next.

Mr. C. W. Wynn was in favour of appointing a determinate day for the meeting of Parliament, under the present circumstances.

Lord Castlereagh objected to the limitation of the bill to a fixed period, rather than six weeks after the meeting of Parliament; but if any fixed period was thought necessary, he would, to avoid the necessity of calling Parliament together at too early a period, propose, that the duration should extend to the first of March.

Mr. Gurney asked, whether the noble lord really intended that the persons now under arrest, in consequence of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, should continue for nine months longer in solitary confinement?

Lord Castlereagh said, that every reasonable indulgence, consistent with safe custody, had been allowed, and would continue to be allowed, to the persons in confinement. An indiscriminate intercourse with them could not be permitted, but their wives and families were allowed to see them under certain regulations.

General Gascoyne said, he had supported the former measure; but, as Parliament was about to rise, he thought the duration of the present bill ought to be precisely limited. It was to be considered, that the present proceeding might serve as a precedent for placing similar powers in the hands of Ministers, less worthy of confidence than the present, when the same necessity for such a measure might not exist: for these reasons, he was inclined to think that the 1st of December, or some definite time, should be fixed.

The Committee then divided—

For the Amendment 45

Against it 78

Majority —33 *

Mr. Douglas rose and moved the omission of the clause that extended the bill to Scotland. He argued that, according to the principles of the union of the two countries, such a measure could not be extended to Scotland, unless an adequate ground of danger were shewn to exist in that country. This had not been done by the Report of the Secret Committee, nor by any information as yet before the House.

Lord Folkestone wished to know whether, in fact, this bill would really extend to Scotland or not? He knew that, according to some legal opinions, the amendment made in the former bill, which passed in the early part of the session, had taken Scotland out of the operation of the Act. As this bill was a copy of the former, he wished to know what was the opinion of Ministers upon this point?

No answer was given.

Sir S. Romilly (after a pause) expressed his surprise that no answer had been given to the question of the noble lord; for if it really was the case, that the bill could have no operation in Scotland, then it was not passed for the purpose of suppressing any dangerous practices in that country, but for some unexplained object of Ministers. He believed that since the former bill passed, not one individual in Scotland had been committed under it. The question was not whether the Habeas Corpus had or had not been properly suspended in the early part of the session, but whether they should now pass a bill, purporting to deprive Scotland of the benefits of the act against wrongous imprisonment, though that measure was not called for by the state of the country, and when it was not certain that the bill could operate. The noble lord opposite had taken merit to himself for not proposing to extend the measure to Ireland, because he said, he only wished to carry it as far as was necessary, and no farther. Upon his own principle, then, the bill ought not to be extended to Scotland.

Lord Castlereagh said, he did not conceive that his Majesty's Ministers were called upon to discuss whether the bill was legally applicable to Scotland or not. It was evident that it was the intention of the bill that the measure should extend to that country. If any member thought that intention was not properly expressed, it would be competent for him to offer an amendment. He saw no reason to suppose, from the wording of the bill, that it could not be executed in Scotland.

* The division was delayed for some time by a question which arose as to the right of those members to vote who were about to enter the House at the time the Committee was proceeding to divide. They were not counted in the division.

Mr. Ponsonby wished to know for what purpose the second Committee of Secrecy had been appointed? Was it for mere form, or was it to lay a parliamentary ground for this measure?—If the latter, he could say, that the Report of the Committee did not touch Scotland; and he would assert farther, that not a tittle of evidence relative to Scotland had been submitted to the Committee. When, therefore, the Report was silent respecting Scotland, and no evidence had been offered of any dangerous or improper practices in that country, was it to be endured that the liberties of the whole Scotch nation were to be taken away on the mere recommendation of his Majesty's Ministers? What availed the good conduct of the people, their unshaken allegiance, their loyalty, or their attachment to the Constitution, if this could be done at the mere will of an Administration. He must declare, that if the Committee, under these circumstances, extended the bill to Scotland, the vote would be the most violent and unjust decision ever made by that House.

Mr. B. Bathurst agreed in substance with what the right hon. gent. had said, that there had been no evidence before the Committee, relative to Scotland, but he did not consider that a reason for exempting that country from the operation of the bill. There had been no evidence about Cornwall, and upon the same principle, it might be said that the bill ought not to extend there. In the same way it might be said, why place all Warwickshire under the operation of the bill?—why not limit it to Birmingham? but the principle on which the Committee went was not that of merely confining the remedy to the local complaint, but to prevent the contagion from spreading. To do so, would be to make the measure quite nugatory and illusory. The proximity of Scotland to England, and the facility of intercourse, rendered it more necessary to extend the measure to that country, than to Ireland, with regard to which, the separation of the sea made a great difference. It would be improper to have a privileged part of the country to which the disaffected might remove, and which might thus be rendered the principal site of the machinations understood to exist in other places.

Sir R. Fergusson said, he was against the measure altogether. With respect to the present question, Ministers had, according to their own shewing, very little reason for extending the bill to Scotland before, and now they had no reason at all. He would call upon the noble lord opposite or the right hon. gentleman who spoke last, whether they could state that any one instance of disorder or disaffection in Scotland had come to the knowledge of Government? Under the old law of Scotland, which he thought too severe, there had been some trials; but the result only tended to show that there was some great error in the proceedings, either of the court, or the law officers, or both. The right hon. gentleman had referred to Cornwall, and it was singular enough that he seemed to think it right to extend the operation of the bill to places because they were free from suspicion of disaffection: that was to apply his remedy where he was sure it would not be wanted. As to the removal of the disaffected, which the right hon. gentleman apprehended might take place, he had always supposed that the emigration was greatest from his (Sir R. Fergusson's) country. The right hon. gentleman surely need not be afraid that the Londoners would fly to Scotland in order to plot against the Constitution. (A laugh.)

Lord G. Cavendish observed, that all the disorders which had occurred in the disturbed districts mentioned in the Report proceeded solely from the spirit of Luddism, against which the present bill was perfectly inoperative. Before the former bill passed, there had been a great many clubs in those districts, which were of an open nature; but after the bill passed, the people, instead of meeting publicly as before, assembled secretly in barns and Methodist meeting-houses, and in that way the late disorders, to which the name of insurrection had been given, were hatched up. Besides the men called Luddites, there were also in Derbyshire people called Stockingers, who were very active in exciting disturbances: but while he stated this, he would ask whether there were not other persons at the bottom of the mischief—whether Mr. Oliver, and such men as he, ought not to be regarded as the chief instruments in these movements? Nothing could be more culpable than that abominable system by which spies and informers were let loose among an ignorant people, to work on their passions and provoke them to acts of violence. The man who was said to have the command in the late riot was a notorious Luddite. He should not object to a law for punishing more severely the crime of frame-breaking, or any bill for strengthening the magisterial authority in the disturbed districts, for there a strong power was doubtless requisite, to protect the property of the country against Luddism; but he must protest against the bill now before the Committee.

Mr. B. Bathurst explained. He admitted that no complaint had come from Scotland, against the loyalty of the people there.

Lord Folkestone expressed his surprise that Ministers had not given any reply to him. His question was, not whether it was a point of policy that this law should extend to Scotland, but whether, in point of fact, Scotland was not taken out of the operation of the act by the way in which the clause was drawn up by the hon. and learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly) below. If that was the case, it was of the utmost importance that the House should know whether they were legislating for Scotland or not. On a former occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that his (Lord F.'s) doubts were to be resolved by a court of law: but how was a court of law to resolve this, in the present situation of the House? It was said, that no person had been taken up in Scotland under the suspension act: but how could this be ascertained? Under that act, there was a power to remove any person from gaol to gaol; and therefore, there existed no proof that no person had been taken up in Scotland. Ministers had expressly refused to give the names and residence of the persons who had been apprehended, lest their friends should become acquainted with their situation. (Hear, hear, hear.) He thought he had stated as strong a case as could be stated, to require of his Majesty's Ministers an answer, whether this act did extend to Scotland, and whether any person in Scotland had been taken up under the act for suspending the Habeas Corpus.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, that Scotland was included in the act, but admitted that no person had been taken up in Scotland, and that no evidence was laid before the second Committee relative to the existence of treasonable practices or disaffection in Scotland. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Falkstone.—Then the right hon. gentleman confesses that no single person has been taken up in Scotland, and that the second Report does not mention Scotland. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Sir W. Burroughs rose to speak, but was prevented by loud and vehement cries of withdraw from the Ministerial benches. The hon. member asserted his right to be heard, and said, that he would stand there till he was heard, though it might be for two hours. The cries of withdraw were then repeated, when the hon. member said, "Sir, if this question is to be carried by clamour, then the fate of the country is decided." This observation was followed by shouts of hear, and cries of withdraw, when strangers were obliged to leave the gallery.

The Chairman then observed, that though a member had a right to speak, he had no right to be heard.

Mr. Bringham said, it was the bounden duty of every person who sat, either in the chair of the House, or in the chair of the Committee, to give protection to every man who rose to speak.

A Member observed, that the House had already been detained a very considerable time in debating this question.

Mr. Penson said, that the House might have been detained a long time, but the subject was of that importance that they could not be detained too long upon it. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member should recollect, however, that the discussion of the particular question then before the Committee had not lasted above an hour. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning said a few words, when Sir W. Burroughs rose, and expressed his conviction, that there was no occasion whatever for extending the powers of this act to Scotland. No person had been apprehended in Scotland, and there was no evidence before the Secret Committee of any disaffection in that part of the Kingdom.

The House then divided upon the question, whether the act should extend to Scotland.

SMALL DEBTS BILL.]—The order for the third reading of this bill to-morrow, was read, and discharged.

FRIVOLOUS ARRESTS BILL.] Sir S. Romilly brought in a bill, to continue an act, intituled, "An Act further to extend and render more effectual certain provisions of an act passed in the 12th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the First, intituled, an Act to prevent frivolous and vexatious arrests; and of an act passed in the 5th year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Second, to explain, amend, and render more effectual the said former act, and of two acts passed in the 19th and 43d years of the reign of his present Majesty, extending the provisions of the said former acts."—It was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time to-morrow.

POOR EMPLOYMENT AMENDMENT BILL.] A bill was brought in, "to amend an act made in the present Session of Parliament for authorizing the issue of Exchequer Bills and the advance of money on Public Works and Fisheries, and Employment of the Poor;" which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, June 27.

The Royal assent was given by commission to Lord Colchester's Annuity Bill, the Salt Laws Excise Bill, the Civil and Military Offices Continuance Bill, the Insurrection Act Continuance (Ireland) Bill, the Fraudulent Tenants Bill*, and several private bills.

[DIVORCES.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved the second reading of a bill, which had been brought in to dissolve the marriage of — Miller with his wife. He observed, that this was a case in which the wife had returned from Malta to England for the recovery of her health, leaving the husband at Malta, and that she had remained in England five years, living in a state of adultery, and having four children in that time, her husband having no suspicion of her misconduct during any part of that period. Letters written by her to her husband, stating the reasons for not going out to Malta, had been given in evidence; and he admitted that these could not be a safe ground to proceed upon,

* The preamble of this Act recites the 11th Geo. II. c. 19, which provides, that, if any tenant at a rack-rent, or where the rent reserved is three fourths of the yearly value of the premises, shall be in arrear for one year's rent, and desert the premises, and leave the same uncultivated or unoccupied, so as no sufficient distress can be had to countervail the arrears of rent, two or more justices of the peace (having no interest in the demised premises), at the request of the landlord, or his bailiff or receiver, may go upon and view the same, and affix on the most notorious part thereof notice in writing what day (at the distance of fourteen days at least) they will return to take a second view; and if upon such second view the tenant, or some person on his behalf, shall not appear and pay the rent in arrear, or there shall not be sufficient distress upon the premises, then the said justices may put the landlord into possession; and the lease to such tenant, as to any demise therein contained only, shall from thenceforth become void: It then recites, that it is expedient, for the due protection of the interest of landlords, that so much of the said act as requires a tenant to be in arrear for one year's rent should be altered, and that the provisions of the said act should be extended to tenancies where no right of entry in case of non-payment is reserved to the landlord. It is therefore enacted, that the provisions of the said recited act shall extend to the case of tenants in arrear for one half year's rent instead of one year, whether they hold by written or verbal agreement, and although no right or power of re-entry be reserved or given to the landlord in case of non-payment of rent.

had it not been that the inference to be drawn from them was confirmed by several of the respectable witnesses, which went to show that the husband had no suspicion of her misconduct. Upon the whole, he thought this a case in which the bill ought to pass.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had not himself moved the second reading of the bill, because he had great difficulty on the principle. Though scarcely any business could be of greater importance to public morals than these divorce bills, yet he was sorry to say, that scarcely any business received so little notice. But this bill particularly called for the attention of their lordships, especially of such of their lordships, if there was any distinction, as ought to make public morals their peculiar care. They were called upon to grant a divorce to one whose wife had been living for five years in the commission of adultery, and who had had four children in that period. She being during all that time absent from her husband, and he having made no effectual inquiry to discover this proceeding, supposing him to have known nothing of it, there were in the letters themselves expressions that might have roused suspicion, unless the husband was blinded by affection for her; which possibly might be the case. His lordship alluded to such excuses for not going out to Malta as this—that if she went out she must take a ship-load of Cheltenham salts with her: but the House would recollect that they must attend not merely to the particular case, but to the general principle, and on that ground he had great difficulty. If he did not object to the second reading, it was because it was necessary to have it read a second time now; if it were to pass at all: but he begged it might be understood, that he had not got over the difficulty in point of principle.

The bill was then read a second time, and committed for Tuesday.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS.] Lord Melville pursuant to his notice (see page 1633) presented a bill to regulate the administration of oaths in certain cases to officers in the naval and military service. His lordship stated, that by different Acts of Parliament, certain oaths were to be administered to officers in the naval and military service, and by the practice which had prevailed, these oaths had invariably been administered to officers in the military service at some period after they had received their commissions; a similar practice had also of late years prevailed with regard to officers in the navy. A doubt, however, had arisen, whether by law these oaths were not required to be taken by the officers before they received their commissions; but there was no instance in the memory of any person in office, now living, of the oaths having been so required to be taken. This being the case, and it being in every respect more desirable that the present practice should be continued, than that what was supposed to be the law, should be literally carried into effect, the object of this bill was to legalize the present practice with regard to officers in the military service, and to assimilate to it the practice with regard to officers in the navy.—His Lordship presented the bill, which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

The Bishop of Peterborough asked what oaths remained to be taken by these officers?

Lord Melville replied, the oath of allegiance, the test oath, the oaths of abjuration and supremacy, and the declaration, as required by the different Acts of Parliament, no alteration being made respecting them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, June 27.

PRISONS ACT CONTINUANCE (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

PAPERS DRAWBACK (SCOTLAND) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

LEATHER TAX.] Mr. H. Davis presented a petition of Tanners of Bristol, setting forth, that the petitioners carried on the business of tanning of leather in 1812, at which period an additional duty of three halfpence per pound was imposed upon tanned leather: that they had no intimation of such additional impost until a short time previous to its being charged: that they did not contemplate any additional charge of duty when they laid in the raw material, then in process of tanning, by which means such additional impost was wholly paid by them, and for which no remuneration was made by the consumer: they stated that the process of tanning placed the tanner under very peculiar circumstances, by which they were precluded from effecting an immediate advance of price to compensate for an unexpected charge of duty, and prayed the House to afford them relief.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

USURY LAWS.] Sir C. Morgan presented the following petition of the Directors of the Chamber of Manufactures and Commerce, at Birmingham, which was ordered to be printed:—"That the petitioners are desirous of expressing to the House their opinion that the terms of private contracts between individuals for the use of money may be left to the discretion of the parties interested as safely as any contract for the price of any other commodity whatever; that the petitioners are also of opinion, that the only proper and reasonable rate of interest of money is that which is proportionate to the advantage to be derived from its use, and that such rate is more likely to be fairly adjusted by the interested competition of individuals amongst one another, than by any compulsory legislative enactment; that the petitioners believe it to have been proved by experience, that the existing laws relative to the limitation of the rate of interests have not only been found to be incapable of accomplishing the avowed object of their enactment, but have had a tendency to raise the market rate of interest above its natural level, inasmuch as that numerous instances have occurred, and particularly since the commencement of the present depressed value of property, wherein persons who have been precluded by law from borrowing money to meet their pending engagements at such higher rate than five per cent., at which it might have been obtained, have been compelled to resort to the expensive expedient of raising money on annuity, or otherwise on terms much more disadvantageous; the petitioners therefore being impressed with a conviction of the injurious tendency of the laws at present in force for limiting the rate of interest, and of the advantages to the community that are likely to arise from the repeal of the same, humbly pray that the House will be pleased to take the subject into their serious consideration, and adopt such measures thereupon as to their wisdom shall seem proper."

COTTON YARN.] Mr. Cawthorne presented a petition from Chorley, in Lancashire, praying that the exportation of yarn might be prevented.—After a few words from Lord Cochrane and Mr. Curwen, the subject was referred to a Committee, consisting of Mr. Cawthorne and others.

Mr. Cawthorne then moved for "copies of all memorials presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, during the present and last year, on the exportation of cotton yarns; also a copy of a memorial from the merchants, manufacturers, and others, of Manchester, presented to the Lords of the Treasury in the spring of the year 1800."—Agreed to.

PERSONS CONFINED FOR TREASON.] Mr. Bennet presented the following "petition of Thomas Evans, confined in one of the condemned dungeons, or strong rooms, of the gaol for the county of Surry, in Horsemonger-lane: "That the petitioner's house, No. 8, Newcastle-street, in the parish of Saint Clement Danes, in the city of Westminster, was entered by Mr. John Stafford, of the public office, Bow-street, accompanied with six, eight, or more persons, in the morning of Sunday the 9th of February last, who forcibly arrested the petitioner and his son (a youth then under twenty years of age,) and took away his papers, which have not been returned, by virtue of an order, or general warrant, issued by Lord Viscount Sidmouth, directed to Mr. John Stafford, authorizing and requiring him, in his Majesty's name, to apprehend and take into custody Thomas Evans, and Thomas John Evans his son, on suspicion of high treason against his Majesty; that this arrest took place several weeks prior to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, when the laws were in full force; and when, as the petitioner conceives, it was highly illegal for any magistrate to order the arrest of individuals in their own dwelling-houses but on information or evidence on oath of some breach of the law: that the petitioner and son were kept closely and separately confined, and denied all intercourse with their friends, or the use of pen, ink or paper, or to see the public prints, or to receive information of any sort, by any possible means, and were taken six different times before the Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, but never examined or questioned touching any act of treason, or any other unlawful conduct, nor could any intreaty of the petitioner prevail upon or induce their lordships to inform him what, or if any legal charge was to be preferred against him, nor who, or if any person, had made oath to any such charge; all that was required of the petitioner was, to inform their lordships if he knew Mr. Arthur Thistlewood, Dr. James Watson, and his son, and questions of the like trifling import; that the petitioner, well knowing that neither himself nor his son had in any way violated the laws of their country, and the petitioner was capable of proving their innocence, to the complete refutation of the unfounded assertion contained in the general warrant of the right hon. Secretary of State, he did, immediately on his commitment to the prison of Cold Bath Fields (by the permission of the keeper,) state this violation of the laws, by the arrest of himself and son, in a petition to the House, which petition he addressed to the members for the city of Westminster, per favour of Samuel Brooke, Esq. of the Strand, and committed the same to the charge of the keeper, by whom it was sent to the office of the Secretary of State, Whitehall, where it was detained, and prevented being presented to the House; that the petitioner, in addition to such petition, made every exertion in his power to procure the assistance of a solicitor, that he might sue out a writ of Habeas Corpus; but such was the nature of the close confinement to which he was subjected, that the petitioner could not obtain such assistance till the third reading of the bill for its suspension in the House; that the petitioner did also, on the 10th day of April last, solicit the Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council (by petition) to be admitted to bail, that he might if possible save his trade, and future dependence of himself and family, from utter ruin, but on the evening of the same day, he and his son were removed from the prison of Cold Bath Fields to the place where he is now confined, and, in spite of remonstrance, put in irons like felons, and separately locked into the strong rooms (or condemned dungeons) of that prison, the furniture of which consists of a bag of chopped woollen rags for a bed, a tub in one corner for a water-closet, a pail for water, a trussel for a table, a chair, and chamber-pot; a fire is allowed for culinary purposes, to be extinguished at dusk; the use of candle is prohibited, and the petitioner had his flute taken from him, by which he endeavoured to beguile some of his lonely hours; that three magistrates visited the petitioner the next day, and approved of the petitioner being kept in irons and wholly confined to his room, but the fetters have since been taken off, in consequence of an application by the petitioner to the Secretary of State; that the petitioner has not been allowed to set his foot out of that room since the 10th day of April, and is strictly prohibited from intercourse with any person but his wife, who is allowed to converse with him a few minutes only at a time, in company with a turnkey, through the grated door of his room: that the following is a copy of the commitment of the petitioner and his son; "Henry Viscount Sidmouth, one of the Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and principal Secretary of State, &c. &c. &c. These are, in his Majesty's name, to authorize and require you to receive into your custody the bodies of Thomas Evans and Thomas John Evans, herewith sent you on suspicion of high treason against his Majesty, and you are to keep them safe and close until delivered by due course of law, and for so doing this shall be your warrant; given at Whitehall this 9th day of April, 1817, Sidmouth;—To the Keeper of his Majesty's gaol for the county of Surry;"—"A true copy, Wm. Walter, Keeper;" that it is wholly out of the power of the petitioner to conjecture the cause of the arrest and detention of himself and his son, beyond their personal knowledge of Mr. Thistlewood and the Messrs. Watsons, as they have not been members of any political association, or taken part in any political meetings, or been found aiding, advising, or encouraging any person or persons in the pursuit of political measures of any kind, nor have they in any way conducted themselves contumeliously towards his Majesty's person, Government, or Ministers, nor is it in the power of any person (with truth) to charge the petitioner or his son with a breach of the law of any nature whatever; and he submits that it is cruel and unjust to inflict punishment upon the petitioner and his son for the proceedings of others, of which they have no knowledge or concern, and over whose conduct they have no control; that the petitioner most humbly, but most confidently assures the House it is not in the power of the right honourable Secretary of State to name or produce any legal cause, or name and specify any act or deed done or said by the petitioner or his son, to justify the cruel persecution to which they are subjected, beyond his own unfounded assertion set forth in the general warrant and commitment herein mentioned, which is unsupported by the smallest testimony of corroborative evidence, either personal or circumstantial; that the petitioner has for the last sixteen years been established in a manufacturing business, employing from six to ten persons, which was wholly dependent on his own management and direction, and by his long detention in prison is totally destroyed; the expenses of his premises and maintenance of his family have consumed his property, his creditors are unpaid, his debtors are several of them gone to America, removed, or failed in business, and his remaining effects threatened to be distrained for arrears of taxes, in which case the wife of the petitioner will be reduced to the state of a houseless wanderer, or be compelled to seek refuge in a work-house; that the petitioner most humbly begs leave to observe to the House, that himself and son have been most illegally and unjustly arrested, imprisoned, banished from their country, put in irons like felons, branded with the epithet of traitors, and destroyed; that they are now languishing in utter solitude, excluded from all means of conducting or arranging their lawful affairs, cut off from the world and their friends, from exercise in the open air, from the cheering rays of the sun, shut in gloomy dungeons like criminals under sentence of death, waiting the hour of execution, for no assignable cause whatever, but that it is the will of the right honourable Secretary of State, on a charge manufactured for the purpose, wholly groundless, false and unfounded, it being well known to the right honourable Secretary of State, that the petitioner and his son have at all times, in all places, and on all occasions, evinced themselves to be the serious and steady advocates of the rights of the Crown, and that this charge of treason has no other support than assertion, the warrants of arrest and commitment themselves are evidence the most incontestable; that the petitioner most humbly assures the House, that this persecution has so alarmed him for his future safety and that of his son, that, should the House consent to a further Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and thereby leave him and his son in the power of the right honourable Secretary of State, he has the most dreadful apprehension they will be still further removed during the recess of Parliament, to some remote part of the country, far from their friends, and unknown, and there left miserably to perish in solitude, to prevent their farther complaints reaching the House; the petitioner therefore most humbly and emphatically implores the House to take his unprecedented situation into their humane consideration; and prays, that should the House find it expedient further to suspend the people's only defence (the Habeas Corpus Act,) that they will be graciously and mercifully pleased to make an exception in favour of the petitioner and his son, to enable them to obtain the protection of the laws, otherwise the petitioner, who is advanced in years, and labouring a long time under an incurable disease, is apprehensive that his cruel persecution will speedily terminate his life."

Mr. H. Addington said, he had never heard of any harsh or severe treatment towards the petitioner, and did not believe that he was more harshly treated than other prisoners under the same charges. As a proof of the kind treatment of such persons, he had to mention, that discharged, Mr. Watson, had written a very becoming letter to the Secretary of State, thanking him for his indulgence to him while in confinement. It was impossible there could be any grounds for the complaints in the petition; but he should be happy and feel it his duty to inquire into the circumstances.

Mr. W. Smith observed, that he did not rise to contradict the right hon. gentleman, for he had only said that no severity had been exercised by the orders of the Secretary of State. He could believe that, and yet believe the complaint of the petition to be well founded. In the case of a lord-lieutenant of a neighbouring country (Lord Hardwicke), he had known a similar contradiction. He (Mr. S.) had then papers put into his hand, alleging the greatest cruelty to have been exercised towards prisoners: he could not believe that the Lord-lieutenant could have sanctioned such acts, but he had no confidence in the tender mercies of the gaolers of that unhappy country. He had since known, from unquestionable authority, that the facts were true, and that the persons concerned deserved to be brought to condign punishment. In the same manner he could believe that the facts here were true, though the Secretary of State had not sanctioned them.

Mr. Barham said, he could not imagine that any person would dare to bring forward such specific charges if they were not true. The Secretary and the Under-Secretary were respectable men; but he wished to know, as to one single fact, whether any one person was, for the sake of security, put in irons. When the House was about to pass a law, suspending the Habeas Corpus, what security could they have against the most flagrant abuses of such a terrible power? There was no person that could answer questions in that House (hear, hear); and no person was allowed to visit the prisoners. (Hear, hear.) Ministers were making the exception the rule, and the rule the exception. It was the bounden duty of the right hon. gentleman to inquire and to know what passed in prisons, when such extraordinary powers were claimed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. H. Addington was proceeding to ask how it was possible for him to know in this case—when the Speaker called him to order, as having already spoken on the question.

Mr. P. Moore said, the noble lord who had been already referred to (Hardwicke), had been grossly misled from beginning to end, with reference to some transactions in another country, and particularly with regard to one of the incendiaries who was extremely active in them, a vile miscreant who deserved a halter instead of a pension. At the time that his lamented friend, the late Mr. Sheridan, brought on a motion, which he had seconded, for an inquiry into the abuses in Kilmainham Gaol, the noble lord (Hardwicke) was so astonished at the statements then made, that he wrote to tell him how he was imposed on; but it turned out on inquiry that the noble lord had been as grossly imposed on as if he had not been in Ireland. The motion was followed up, and they got a Committee of Inquiry appointed; and there was sufficient proof obtained that the superintendent of the prison, a person of the name of Trevor, ought to have been hanged—aye, and hanged a hundred times; and yet this person stood on the pension list. (Hear, hear, hear.) Now those miscreants were not able of themselves to oppress; they abused the ear of the Secretary of State, and got a law passed to put the liberties of the whole nation in their power. As he was not disposed to encourage cruelty, he would not consent to the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus.

Mr. Macdonald thought the assertion of the right hon. gentleman warranted an inference which he was not perhaps aware of. He had said that the petitioner was not worse treated than other prisoners. This prisoner was put in irons. Was the inference therefore admitted, that other prisoners were put in irons? The right hon. gentleman seemed to think himself bound to know very little on the subject. (Hear, hear.) The Secretaries of themselves, contrary to law, and to all former practice, excluded magistrates; and yet they did not consider themselves bound to know or explain any thing on the subject. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bennet said, the gaol was different from other gaols. In other gaols they had more room, and a yard to walk in. The gaol in Horsemonger-lane had no yard: for this, among other reasons, it was of essential benefit that gaols and prisoners should be accessible to the inspection of the public eye.

Lord Folkestone would fain know who it was that was responsible, since all magistrates and other persons were excluded? (Hear, hear.) Under such laws and restrictions, who was to answer that prisoners were not put in irons, and even to the torture? The Secretary had promulgated a new law as to prisoners; and having done so, he now said that he was not bound to know any thing about the matter. The other night it was stated that solitary confinement was authorized by the law: the noble lord (Castlereagh) had declared, that there was a distinction as to high treason, and that all prisoners under that charge were committed to safe and close custody. The noble lord had taken this up from the Attorney-General, but stated it more clearly and explicitly. He (Lord F.) had not then been prepared to deny that doctrine; but he had since endeavoured to ascertain the law, and was now ready to shew that a false interpretation had been given to it. From the books, it appeared, that all prisoners were committed to safe and close custody. In Bumsstead's Reports, there was a case in which Lord Chief Justice Coke laid it down as the law, that gaolers are bound to keep all prisoners committed to them in safe and close custody. The same doctrine was to be found in Bacon's Abridgment, and in Coke upon Lyttleton. There was thus no authority for solitary confinement in the case of State prisoners. He had, however, seen directions from the Secretary of State to keep them in solitary confinement. (Hear, hear.)

Irons were only to be applied when absolutely necessary. Other prisoners were not put in irons, and therefore it was not necessary that they should be.

Mr. B. Bathurst thought it was rather too much to call upon persons to prove a negative, to prove that certain statements were not true which they now heard for the first time. The only mode of proceeding was to have petitioned the Secretary of State, and to obtain redress of the grievance, or a change of gaol. It was necessary to prevent traitors from associating in prison, otherwise they would carry on conspiracies. The Secretary of State did not prevent all persons from visiting prisoners.

Lord Folkestone replied, that none were admitted but by a special order from the Secretary of State.

Lord Cochrane considered the subject deserving of the serious attention of the House, and of being inquired into by a Committee. Why was not Newgate the place of the prisoner's confinement? The reason was, that the London magistrates would have insisted upon seeing him. What was the difference between tyranny in Algiers, and under the Deys opposite? Englishmen, however, would not become slaves all at once. A revolution so sudden could not be effected by all the bayonets which Ministers had at their command. Was it to be endured that persons could be thrown at the pleasure of Ministers into dungeons, immured there in irons, and imprisoned and tortured so, while that House was prorogued? Could the idea of subjecting every man in the kingdom to such tender mercies be borne by people of reflection and spirit? A petition was before attempted to be forwarded to the House in vain. How was it possible, then, for prisoners to make their sufferings known? Ministers did not themselves visit gaols, and gaolers could not be expected to forward petitions against their own cruelty and oppression. The House should not give such powers to any men, however perfect; and he did not consider that the present Ministers ought to be entrusted with any authority beyond the laws. The House was bound to inquire into this case before it passed the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

On the motion that it be printed,

Mr. Barham gave notice that, unless the facts were previously explained, he would on Tuesday next move, that it be referred to a Committee to inquire into the circumstances in which the petitioner was apprehended and detained.

Mr. Brougham said, there was an allegation in the petition which, if it could not be proved to be wholly untrue, involved a serious breach of the privileges of the House. It was stated, that the petitioner had prepared a petition, and, being an inhabitant of Westminster, had sent it to be presented by the members for that city. By inquiry of his hon. friend, the worthy baronet, one of the two members, he found that it never came into his hands; he believed the noble lord, the other member, had not received it. It was in fact never received. This, if true, was a great breach of the privileges of the House. (Hear, hear.) In the early part of this Session a case of a petition from Warrington, in Lancashire, which was kept or detained, was brought before them; and his hon. friend below him stated very strongly the high responsibility of such conduct. He trusted the House had not, in all the changes which it had undergone, learnt to contend for no privileges against the Executive Government, and to view all their privileges as of use only against the people. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Ponsonby entirely coincided with his hon. friend; but there was much more than a breach of privilege in this case. It certainly was not the intention of the House, in suspending the Habeas Corpus, that cruel usage should be inflicted upon those who were confined. He would not say that the complaints were true, because the parties complained against had not been heard; but it was the duty of the House to inquire, and if full and satisfactory explanation were not given, to appoint a Committee of their own for the purpose.

Lord Castlereagh submitted, that if it was the duty of Ministers to take care that they did not abuse the powers given to them, it was the duty of the House to allow a presumption in their favour till the facts were proved. He admitted that every tenderness was due to persons in the unhappy situation of the petitioner: but there was here an inversion of the proper mode of proceeding. The complaint came to the ears of Ministers in the first instance, not from the individual, but from gentlemen on the other side, and Ministers were charged with inattention, or neglect, if they were not prepared, by inspiration, to answer every question. He submitted that it was the duty of members, before they presented such petitions, to ascertain whether application had been made to the Executive Government. He begged of the House not to suffer an impression to be made upon their minds, that there was not an anxiety to give every possible indulgence to persons committed by Ministers.

Lord Folkestone said, the noble lord, by his speech, had given the House to understand that prisoners ought to be treated tenderly; but they were not allowed to confer with their friends. In the instructions to the Gaoler of Reading this was positively forbidden. How the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennet,) had obtained the petition, he knew not; but by the instructions to the Gaoler of Reading, all complaints or communications whatever were ordered to be first transmitted to the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Harcourt said there was no order by which the visiting magistrates were precluded from seeing the prisoners. As the visiting magistrates were appointed, under the 31st of the King, especially to visit all persons, to exclude them would amount to a dispensation with the law. He had the highest opinion of the manner in which the Secretary for the Home Department generally exercised his duties.

Lord Castlereagh said, if there was any delay on the part of gaolers in transmitting petitions to the Secretary of State, it would form a case for parliamentary inquiry. The regulation of State Prisoners was at the discretion of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Bennet said, that as the petition was couched in proper terms, he thought it his duty to present it (hear.)

Sir S. Romilly observed, that if the noble Lord supposed that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act gave the Secretary of State any power to regulate prisons, or to dispense with the law of the 31st of the King, he was mistaken.

Sir W. Burroughs hoped that these persons had not been apprehended without information upon oath.

The Attorney-General said, they were arrested before the Suspension Act passed.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

Lord Ossulston said, he had a petition to present of the Mayor, Bailiffs, and Burgesses of Berwick-upon-Tweed, against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. As the Members for that town had declined to obey the instructions of their Constituents by supporting the petition, it had fallen into his hands. It had been said, that there was not a general feeling in the country against the suspension of the Constitution. He had no means of ascertaining the general feeling; but he supposed few Englishmen could be in favour of a Bill which deprived them of the security for their liberty. At least in the Corporation of Berwick the feeling was against it, for they were unanimous in the petition.—The petition was read and ordered to be printed.

Sir F. Burdett said, he had a similar petition to present from the parish and town of Godalming. The petitioners stated, that from the Report of the House of Lords, the event of the late trials, and the facts which had fortunately transpired at Leeds, they conceived they had more to fear from spies and informers, than from any machinations of the factious or disaffected: against the latter they could defend themselves, against the former there was no protection. They feared many innocent men might now be languishing in dungeons, without having an opportunity of vindicating their innocence; and that, as Englishmen, they firmly, though respectfully, protested against a system which left not only their liberty, but their health, comfort, and consequently their lives, to the discrimination of the Privy Council, instead of that of the judges, and jurors of the land.

The petition was read and ordered to be printed.

Lord Castlereagh moved the third reading of the Bill for continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

Mr. Bennet rose. He said, that although he had but little hope of making an impression on the House by his opposition to the measure, he felt it his duty to protest against it. The noble lord who opened this subject to the House, had properly divided it into the causes and the remedies of the discontent. The causes he (Mr. B.) conceived might be all traced to want of food and want of work in the districts which had been disturbed; the remedies were work and food. During the war, the ingenuity of mechanics had been exerted to find all possible substitutes for human labour, and as the demand for the produce of labour had now diminished, an enmity towards machinery had grown up and had broken out into acts of violence. It was fit that this spirit should be repressed, and if a vigilant execution of the laws were not sufficient, local laws might be enacted to suppress it,—but it formed no pretext for putting all Britain to the ban on account of frequent breaches of the peace in five counties. There was no case more in point than the disturbances in the year 1812. If any one would look into the Report drawn up at that time, and no one should proceed to a vote without reading it, he would find in it as many high-sounding words as in those on which they were called to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. It spoke not only of incitements to tumult, but of military array, of seizing of arms, of all the signs of levying war against the State. To meet that evil they passed the Arms Act, and the Act against delegates. The first was never executed; the other had been of some service. The discontent in that instance had originated in want of work and food, and it had greatly subsided, as he trusted it would now, by the great demand for goods. He denied that there were strong marks of a political character in the present discontents. Whenever Englishmen were distressed, as they were happily in the habit of looking to political subjects, the consideration of which was not confined, as in some other countries, to the upper classes, they would naturally put forward the faults and mismanagement of their rulers as the causes of their sufferings; but there was nothing of a systematic hostility to the Constitution, though some individuals had been urged to hostile measures by spies and informers. He should say a few words as to the first Report. That Report had carried through the House the first bill for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. But he was authorized in saying, by some of the members of the Committee, that if that witness had been produced to them, who had been since brought forward, to the disgrace of criminal justice, his evidence would have been scouted by them. There was a disgraceful riot, indeed, of which the promoters had escaped punishment on account of the ridiculous attempt to prosecute them for high treason. Was it to be supposed that a British Jury could be persuaded that six men could levy war against the State (hear)? If there was any part of the first Report, which would fix the crime of high treason on the persons concerned in the disturbances, it was the correspondence between the disaffected in London, and those in the country; but it was to be recollected, that nothing in support of this was tendered in evidence, it was not asserted or even alluded to by the Attorney-general (hear!) The second Report was drawn up in a spirit very different from the first. One of the principal facts mentioned was, the march to London, under the pretence of petitioning; but the magistrates engaged in the late examinations at Wakefield were of opinion, that the whole plan and project referred to had been the work of spies. It was not Oliver alone, who had been employed, but a thousand others; the business of a spy was a trade, which had been pursued with great success, and unfortunately it was the only trade successful at present in those parts; so much as 10, 12, and 13 shillings a night had been paid to these workers of mischief. The Report also contained allegations as to the conduct of particular persons; for instance, that one man avowed himself a republican and a leveller. He had no doubt that evidence might be collected that hundreds were republicans and levellers. Dr. Colquhoun, in his book on the Police, had stated, that 25,000 persons rose every morning in London without any other prospect of subsistence than by plunder. Who would doubt that these men were republicans and levellers? that is, that they would desire to get as much as possible of the property which they did not possess. It was also said, that the insurrection in the time of Richard II. and the Irish Rebellion, were held up as models for imitation—very unfortunate models, as, in both those instances, the leaders had been punished. Was there any thing like a shadow of truth in these stories? or, if they were true, could they have had any effect? As, in the first Report, there was a plot to destroy London, so, in the second, there was a plot to destroy Manchester. This suggestion, he had no doubt, was the work of the spies. In 1812 it was proved, that the men who were employed to detect the rioters had suggested that they should burn the poor-houses. “What!” said one of the rioters, “shall we burn the poor?” —“Yes,” rejoined the spy, “any thing to do mischief.” It was more likely that such a proposition should be made by spies. If all the carpenters in London were to conspire to throw their working-tools into the Thames, it would not be more absurd than for the manufacturers to destroy the sources of their employment. The barracks, it was said, were to be set on fire; the soldiers were to be burnt out, as in London they were to be smoked. But why had none of these persons been brought to trial*? Birmingham, also, had been mentioned in this Report, as a place which had sent delegates. Several gentlemen at Birmingham, seeing this statement, had set on foot a minute inquiry, and he had received an account of the result from a gentleman of respectability and property, of the name of Clark, who was well known to those acquainted with the town of Birmingham. (The hon. member here read a paper, which stated, that on minute inquiry it appeared that Oliver had been in Birmingham. He was first introduced there by Mitchell, to a person with whom the latter had been long acquainted. Oliver was there three times—in April, in May, and again in June. He stated that he was intimate with Sir F. Burdett, Major

* The Blanketeers, as they were called, or the persons who were arrested near Manchester, have been since set at liberty, without being put upon their defence. On Saturday, Sept. 6th, they were to have been tried in the Assize Court at Lancaster; but after the jury had been sworn, and the charge stated against the prisoners, Mr. Topping, (counsel for the Crown) addressed the jury to this effect:—I am very happy to save his Lordship and you all trouble in this case. It is well known, that in the month of March last, the town of Manchester and its vicinity were thrown into great terror and alarm by tumultuous assemblies. The defendants are charged with having called such assemblies, to the great alarm of the vicinity, and to the undoubted danger of the country. By the exertions, however, of the very respectable part of the people of Manchester, and by the co-operation of the very excellent police of that place, the evil has been effectually suppressed, so that all is now quiet and tranquil in the extensive, populous, and, I hope, still opulent county of Lancaster. It cannot be the wish of any Government, and especially of our Government, to punish unnecessarily. The improved and still improving state of the country has given a different turn to public feeling from what it was in March last. On this account, and as the defendants have already suffered so long imprisonment, no evidence is to be offered to you on the part of the prosecution. You will therefore acquit the defendants.—The jury accordingly returned a verdict, Not Guilty.

Mr. Williams (Counsel for the prisoners).—Will your Lordship allow me to ask for the discharge of the prisoners, as they have been so long in confinement?

Mr. Baron Wood.—Certainly: let them be discharged.

The Derbyshire rinters are to be tried at Derby on the 15th Oct. A special commission has been issued to Mr. Justice Abbot and Mr. Justice Holroyd for that purpose. The indictment contains three counts. The 1st, which is for a substantive act of treason, in directly levying war against the King, is upon the statute of 25th Edward III. The 2d count, which is for conspiring to depose the King, is to be proved by a series of overt acts, again number, and is founded upon the 36th of George III. And the third count, for conspiring to levy war against the King, in order to compel him by force to change his measures, is made out by the same overt acts, and is founded upon the same statute as the preceding.

Cartwright, and other gentlemen who were friends to Parliamentary Reform: he never saw more than the five men whom he met at Mitchell's friend's; he spoke of a plan for a meeting of delegates, and when he could not induce them to join in this design, he, on his return to Yorkshire, sent two messengers to inform them that a rising was intended, and begged them to send some one to meet him at Dewsbury on the 9th of June, which was the day on which he was arrested at that place by Sir J. Byng, and afterwards liberated. He stated that he had the management at Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, the rest of Yorkshire and Derby; and if he had persuaded any of the five persons he saw to have joined in his designs, he would no doubt have added Birmingham to the list. All these five persons were ready to give evidence, and the writer was authorized to implore that the House would examine them at its bar. Oliver seemed to have plenty of money, and never spared expense).—Where this man got his money, perhaps those who employed him could say. It had been stated that he was not to be rewarded; he hoped, that not only he would not be rewarded, but that he would be put upon his trial, to answer the offences which so many facts formed a presumption that he had committed.—Were such men to be sent forth on a mission against the lives and liberties of the subject—to raise plots, which, while they might destroy the lives of individuals, were to induce the House to pass, and the country to submit to, the suspension of the liberties of the whole community? It had been said, that discredit was thrown on all persons who gave information against conspiracies. This was not true: there was a wide difference between different classes of these persons. Those to whom knowledge of conspiracies had casually come, and who had revealed them, as for instance, the man who gave notice of the gunpowder plot, were very praiseworthy persons. As for the other class, that of informers—persons who had taken one step in a conspiracy and wished to recede—they should be looked on with some suspicion, especially when they received pecuniary reward for the evidence they were to give. Of course he did not mean to include men like Reynolds, who asked no money, and only wished to have a small bill cashed! He did not know whether Mr. Oliver had had a small bill cashed, as he appeared to have had plenty of money. There was a third class of persons who had not been accomplices, but who had set up for such; he would say boldly that no Government should uphold those men. To send persons to drive and drill the people into crimes, was an insult to a free country. It was not, however, wonderful that the persons who protected Reynolds, and bestowed honours on him—that the men who produced Castle as a witness, that indignity to a court of justice, should, as part of their system, employ such men. As to the Secretary for the Home Department; he believed him to be a man of great humanity, but, in point of judgment, extremely weak. How otherwise could he have been made the dupe and tool of a wretch like Oliver, the most infamous miscreant that had ever been let loose to scourge a country? What could the Ministers have done more if they had declared war upon the people? If they had determined to make law a curse instead of a blessing? If they had endeavoured to make the country miserable, and the Government alternately oppressing and insulted? These were the steps which drove a country to despair. No people could long bear to be looked on with distrust, and insulted as a set of conspirators against the Constitution; and never was an imputation more false than this imputation on the people of England, than whom no nation was ever more attached to its institutions. He should now mention some other facts respecting the mission of Oliver. He should state the heads of the examination which took place at Wakefield on Monday the 16th of June last, for the accuracy of which he could pledge himself. (The hon. member then read the heads of the examination of Mr. Dickinson). The next evidence he mentioned was that of a person who had been an accomplice, he should not mention his name, he was a native of Sheffield. (He stated, that Oliver had been represented to him as a man who did great things in London. Mitchell had preceded Oliver, and had told them that they might rely on him. Deponent was appointed a delegate by a person named Oliver; all the other delegates were named in the same manner as deponent. One delegate was rejected by Oliver, and deponent knew that Oliver must have approved of all of them!) This had been sworn to before the magistrates.—It thus appeared that this Oliver had been the instigator and contriver of the whole transaction. He had led on the miserable, starving, and indigent people; and it was imperative on the Government to deliver him up to the law which he had violated. He should be sorry to say any thing which should draw down upon individuals the punishment of death, a punishment which he thought should never be inflicted except in case of murder; but it was rather singular that there remained at this moment, in Newgate, men under sentence of death for endeavouring to create, not treasons, but felonies, for the purpose, like the miscreant Oliver, of stilling fellow beings to destruction.—He contended, that the operation of the measure on the country neither had been nor could be beneficial. In former times, when rebellions were about to break out, supported by men of rank, weight and influence, the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended, to enable the Government to arrest the heads of the rebellion—as in the case of the arrest of Sir William Windham, in 1715. But where were the Sir W. Windhams of the present day! When ten leaders were taken one day, ten leaders were chosen on the morrow. Some magistrates had said that it had produced great benefits. He could name those magistrates—men familiar to the ears of members as the friends of harsh and strong measures, and the employers of spies in 1812. Against their opinions he should oppose the temperate judgment of Earl Fitzwilliam, a nobleman sufficiently disposed to alarm, when there was any reason for it. The measure under consideration was indeed of such a nature, that he would not commit the powers it proposed to create, even to the best men in society, and he had the strongest objections to grant them to the members of the present administration. He would not authorize a Secretary of State, at his own discretion, to deprive any man in the kingdom of his liberty, without stating the reason, or being bound to afford the party accused an opportunity of trial or justification. For thus, indeed, a Secretary of State would be enabled to deprive any man of his character as well as of his freedom, and when even his imprisonment terminated, to subject him to public suspicion, without the means of vindication. Such a proposition was so odious in every point of view, that he trusted the House, if it desired to obtain the esteem of the country, and to preserve the principles of the Constitution, would reject it with indignation.

Mr. C. Grant said, that the hon. gentleman opposed the measure because he denied the danger, and thus gave them to understand, that he would support the former, provided the latter could be satisfactorily established. It was because he (Mr. G.) thought the danger imminent, and that the exigency of the crisis could be met in no other way, that he should follow an opposite conduct, and vote for the bill. It had been gratuitously assumed in argument, that this measure was a suspension of the Constitution; whereas, in his view, it was merely a remedy for a case contemplated by the Constitution, and provided for in it, without violating it. The hon. gentleman had denied that a conspiracy against the State existed, because the only alleged disturbances proceeded in his opinion from the instigation of ministerial agents. It had never been proved, however, that Government had sanctioned the conduct which Oliver was accused of having pursued, or that any person was implicated but that individual himself, who had acted without any countenance from his employers. He heard many gentlemen deny, on these grounds, the existence of all danger whatever; and, from a regard to their judgment and integrity, he should have been staggered in his own convictions of an opposite kind, did he not recollect that men of good principles and sagacious understandings had been found in all ages and countries who, in seasons of great public alarm, distrusted the reality or the magnitude of approaching calamities, and, by their incredulity, increased the danger. Ancient and modern states furnished examples of fatal error, which allowed the designs of conspirators to advance unchecked to a point when resistance became unavailing. Of Cataline's conspiracy, it had been said, by a great orator and statesman, when speaking of the character of such men to whom he had alluded, "Nonnulli sunt in hoc ordine qui aut ea quæ imminet, non vident, aut ea quæ vident, dissimulant: qui spem Catalinæ molibus sententiis aluerunt, conjurationemque nascentem non credendo corroboraverunt." Was there nothing disclosed in the Reports that manifested designs against the State? We had plots; we had secret oaths, we had organized societies, committees, sub-committees, and delegates, blasphemous and seditious songs; and, above all, the prostitution of the press to the most infamous purposes of destroying all loyalty to the Throne, and all reverence towards religion; thus making the people immoral, impious, and turbulent upon system. (Hear, hear.) The most dangerous doctrines were propagated to aid this settled design: the rich were declared the natural enemies of the poor; plans of robbery and spoliation were recommended to the people as the means of recovering their proper rights, and a division of the land was held out as the attraction for rebellion. By these dangerous doctrines the poor were taught that they could only find their just level in the disorders of the State, and were seduced from their duties of loyalty and honesty. These were the dangers against which this measure was intended to protect the public peace, the public morals, and the national faith; and much as he valued that sacred bulwark of our liberties, the Habeas Corpus, he would say, that he valued the sacred principle of public order and religion still more; and if he had to decide between the suspension of the one or the surrender of the other, he would not long hesitate on the alternative. (Hear.) It was well known that this country had of late years taken a great start in population, wealth, manufactures, and political consequence; but it could not be denied, that in this change there were causes of danger generated which did not exist before. Great masses of people were assembled in single districts, whose occupations were precarious, and who, as they had not improved in morals or advanced in education, in proportion as they had increased in numbers and physical force, might, in a season of distress, be excited by turbulent and unprincipled demagogues to disturb the national tranquillity, and endanger the Constitution and religious institutions of the State. (Hear, hear.) It was said by an hon. gentleman that all that the people wanted was, not insurrection, but food and employment. He allowed that their discontent might be allayed by prosperity; but who was to ensure that prosperity? or how was public order to be preserved till it returned? It was strange to hear that poverty and distress, which constituted the source of the danger, converted into an argument to disprove its existence. But it had been said, admit distress to be a reason for suspending the Constitution, and there were no limits to such tyrannical interference. He could not allow this argument to be well founded. The distress, he hoped, would be only temporary: the other causes of danger, such as the want of regular education, and the demoralizing influence of the poor laws, might be more permanent; but still they were not indefinite; and when the distress was removed, might no longer excite such alarm. When it was asked, were not the ordinary laws sufficient for repressing these causes of danger, by punishing popular excesses or seditious attempts? he would answer, that ordinary laws were sufficient for ordinary times; and that the Suspension Act was merely intended to arrest the progress of evils which would deprive them of all their efficacy; and to prevent that state of things which, if once realized, would render confusion irreparable. In the case of individuals, prevention was better than punishment; in the case of nations, prevention was the only safe policy, and the other alternative was impossible. It could not for a moment be admitted as a question with regard to the State, whether we were to avert an approaching evil, or to enter into a struggle to defeat it. In such a struggle the Constitution might survive, but it could not be expected to come out of it unimpaired. This observation seemed to apply with peculiar force to those who argued against the suspension, on the ground that it should never be resorted to except in a season of general disaffection. The effect of this bill would be to prevent general disaffection, by giving a power to restrain the efforts of those who were endeavouring to spread it; as, when it arrived, nothing but a civil war could be expected to ensue. It had been said, if the disaffection is not general, why not make the operation of the bill local; but it was sufficient to reply to this question, that if its operation were confined to particular districts, the evil would diffuse itself over others, and would make the danger general in all the country, except in those very places where the remedy was intended to apply. (Hear, hear.) It was argued, that the evil was not alarming, as only the dregs of the people were imbued with corrupt principles. This was equivalent to an assertion that property, wealth, and talents, were necessary to constitute danger; but he would ask, did the history of revolutions warrant such a belief? Was it true, that what was dangerous in the result never followed what was ridiculous or contemptible at the commencement; and that what was formidable was never joined to what was absurd? An opposite experience was written in the annals of Europe; and the disastrous history of revolutionary France loudly warned the world against deciding on the practical success of a political doctrine from its theoretical absurdity. (Cries of hear.) Those who argued against the present bill had denied, as one reason for passing it, the efficiency of the former suspension act. Whence did they derive this fact? The Reports of both Houses stated the contrary. They declared, that though it had not removed danger, it had checked it, and had acted as a salutary control over demagogues, who endeavoured to disturb the public peace. It likewise gave courage to the friends of order, the loyal and virtuous portion of the community. He believed the majority of the people were well disposed, but they ought not to be left to the attacks and machinations of the turbulent and the seditious. He called upon the House to consider the dangers that would ensue from withholding this measure. He heartily supported the third reading.

Mr. Warre said, he was now as ready to oppose the suspension act as he was formerly disposed to support it. He was glad to find that he was not singular in this change. In the first Report we heard of the formidable nature of the Spencean doctrines, and the dangerous machinations of the sect that professed them. If such was the cause of alarm three months ago, and if the declared and deliberate scheme of dividing the land of the country was then the ground for this measure of precaution, that scheme was now at an end, for no more was heard of its existence. (Hear.) The next cause of alarm was the conspiracy that organized the Spafields riot; the plan of seizing the Tower, and raising the standard of rebellion in the capital. This plot and insurrection had almost vanished from our recollection, and appeared no longer to alarm the Committee. The ground of attack was now changed, and instead of hearing of plans to seize the metropolis by a mob from Spafields, we heard of an army advancing from the country for that object. (Hear, hear.) But the Manchester force was even more absurd and contemptible than the London mob. It was stated to amount to 50,000, and auxiliaries were spoken of from Scotland and other places; all, no doubt, marshalled and arrayed by the spy Oliver. (Hear.) Their military chest, however, did not seem very well supplied, as they had no money to procure arms. They commenced their march, but were dispersed by a few constables before they proceeded far on their journey. As they could not procure arms, it was said that they intended to remove the horses from the carts and waggons which they might find in their neighbourhood, and to take Manchester by a charge of cavalry. (A laugh.) The whole account seemed so absurd, that he wondered it could be listened to seriously for a moment. He was not ashamed to say that he had been deceived, that he had overrated the danger, and that he would now retrace his steps in opposing the bill. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Protheroe also opposed the bill, although he had before supported it. He was alarmed with the Report of the Committee at the beginning of the session, but the time that had elapsed, and the inquiries which had taken place, enabled him to see the danger in a different light, and to satisfy himself that it was very much exaggerated. The liberties of the people should not be surrendered on the ground of dangers that did not now exist. The Habeas Corpus was the great bulwark of our freedom, and the pride of Englishmen; and, as a fundamental law, ought not to be suspended except in cases of urgent necessity. There was a regulation in an ancient state, that when a citizen proposed to alter any of the fundamental laws, he should enter the assembly of the people with an halberd about his neck, that summary justice might be executed upon him if he did not adduce sufficient grounds for the change*. He did not think it would have been very safe for the noble lord (Castlereagh) to have been a citizen of such a state in bringing forward this measure. (A laugh.)

Mr. Hart Davis differed from his hon. colleague, and thought it due to the loyal inhabitants of Bristol, as well as to the country at large, to take every possible precaution to defend them from the evils of anarchy and rebellion. He was satisfied that if the prosecution of the persons who had been lately tried had been confined to a lower description of offence, there would have been little difficulty in proving their guilt. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. G. Banks said, he was not aware of any circumstances which had transpired since the last Report that ought to induce Parliament to retrace the steps it had already taken. When he alluded to the magnitude of the existing danger, he desired to be understood as not considering it to amount to the danger of immediate revolution; but if there was no ground for entertaining apprehensions with regard to the life of the Sovereign, there were strong grounds for suspecting danger to the peace and tranquillity of his loyal subjects.

Mr. Barham could not help regarding the danger to the State, upon the alleged existence of which the bill was principally founded, as a ridiculous phantom. He could discover in it no reason for depriving the country of the best security for the possession of its liberties, and without which every other security was an idle and useless provision. So long as the power of tearing him from his family, without a cause assigned, was vested in any man, it was an insult and a mockery to talk of the advantages and blessings of our free Constitution. (Hear, hear.) He concurred entirely in the opinion of an hon. member, who had professed that he should prefer to live under martial law rather than under a Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The duration of martial law would probably be short, but the continuance of the present measure was necessarily uncertain. The trial by jury was the great right that distinguished a British subject from a subject of the Dey of Algiers. The chief cause of the existing evil was a state of general distress;

* This was the ordinance of Zaleucus, the Locrian lawgiver. (See Potter's Antiq. of Greece, vol. i. p. 166.)

and severe distress never could be felt without producing some degree of discontent. What he feared was, that hon. members were more disposed to sacrifice the Constitution than to submit to a slight and temporary inconvenience. (Hear.) An argument had been drawn in favour of this measure from the personal character of the Minister to whom such extraordinary authority was to be intrusted. Without entering into that inquiry, or stating any impression which he might entertain upon that subject, he must declare, that this was not an English consideration. (Hear, hear.) Our liberties were not obtained by confidence in the Ministers of the Crown, nor could they be preserved by such means. The boast of Englishmen had always been, not that Ministers would not, but that they could not disturb the personal liberty of any individual. The abominable sentiment, as versified by one of our favourite poets, seemed to be the principle by which Parliament was now advised to direct its policy:—

"For forms of Government let fools contest,
"Whate'er is best administered is best."

He had his suspicions that the actual extent of the evil was, in a great measure, to be imputed to his Majesty's Ministers, who appeared to have suffered it to have grown up in order to furnish a pretext for demanding these new and extraordinary powers. Instead of palliatives, they had applied caustics to the distemper, and aggravated instead of abating its symptoms. He trusted that he was a loyal subject, and ready to spill the last drop of his blood in defence of the Constitution; but he felt himself bound to state, at the same time, that the suspension of the law of Habeas Corpus would leave little or no choice between the advantages of the British laws and those of any foreign government.

Dr. Phillimore said, it was with painful anxiety, and after a laborious inquiry into the facts and circumstances upon which this measure was founded, that he rose to give it his support. It was not before he had gone through a long examination of the subject, that his mind had arrived at the conviction that the bill now under discussion was the dictate of a necessary and even of a humane policy. The whole subject resolved itself into two questions—first, as to the existence of the danger, and secondly, as to the propriety of the remedy. He had the admission of an hon. member, who had been vehement in his opposition to the bill, that the existing danger was great: that the leaders of the disaffected, if not formidable from their property or rank, were important from the possession of popular talents and great energy of character. A right hon. gentleman, (Mr. Ponsonby,) had expressed his doubts with regard to the extent of the evil; but he would ask him whether he did not believe that this measure must operate as an engine of powerful and salutary intimidation against those to whom alone it was likely to be applied? He supported it, because he deemed it a debt of justice which Parliament was bound to pay as a necessary security for the lives and properties of their fellow-citizens. It was true, that he did not believe the conspirators had it in their power to overturn the Constitution; but it did not follow that they might not have produced serious and irreparable mischief. The destruction of a populous town, or the desolation of a cultivated district, were evils of no trifling magnitude. The reign of Richard the Second was fertile of instances in which the violence of an insurgent force, and the excesses of a populace, inflamed by fancied grievances, were fully represented. The alterations in the state of the country, and the various exigencies of affairs, had rendered it frequently necessary to suspend the operation of the act in question. Since its first enactment, the reign of James the Second was the only reign during which no suspension of it had taken place; yet the principles of liberty had never been so well understood as during the last century in this country. Very few were disposed to deny that the suspension of the year 1793 was an expedient measure. In answer to the objection, that this proceeding had never been adopted except during a period of civil or foreign war, he should say, that a danger similar to that which at present threatened the Constitution had never before existed in this country. With regard to the employment of spies, circumstances occurred in the history of all countries, in which governments found it necessary to resort to such means for detecting mischievous designs. On this subject he would refer to what Lord Clarendon had said, on Lord Falkland's objection to the employment of persons of that description. It was with reluctance he gave his consent to the bill, but his vote was founded on a conviction of the urgent necessity of the measure.

Lord Nugent thought it necessary to state, in a few words, the grounds on which he deemed himself bound to give his opposition to the measure under the consideration of the House. He had listened with great and respectful attention to the preceding debates, and all that he had heard had only tended to confirm him in the opinion that the bill ought not to pass. Seeing, however, as he did, some men whom he had always looked up to as the highest authorities, giving the sanction of their approbation to the measure, he must confess that it was with regret he found himself compelled to differ from them. He certainly felt great respect for those persons who framed both Reports, and there were persons in the Committees for whom he entertained the highest veneration; but, notwithstanding, he could not regard those Reports as sufficient authority for passing this bill. It could never be forgotten that the evidence on which these documents were founded was not only ex-parte, but entirely prepared by Ministers. These Ministers, as had been well said in that House, had put the country on its trial; they had, indeed, not only done so, but they stood forward as the accusers, and framed the testimony in a way to procure judgment in their favour. It was, then, not too much to say, that some evidence ought to be admitted on the part of the country, before the verdict was pronounced. The Committee, however, had not merely acted as a grand jury to find ground for trial, but had passed sentence themselves. If he had had no objection to the first Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, the circumstance of that suspension having been followed by no acts which tended to shew its necessity, would have afforded him a strong ground for resisting this. It had indeed been said, that the former bill had accomplished much in the way of intimidation; that if it had not been passed, the country would have been in a state of rebellion; but these statements were unsupported by facts, and he thought the onus probandi lay on those who asserted such propositions. On what other evidence besides the ex-parte statements furnished by Ministers were the Reports founded? On none, except that which had been brought forward at the recent trial of Mr. Watson, and which reflected such deep disgrace on Ministers. The proceedings in that case were, in fact, as absurd as shameful: for a man had been indicted for treason who probably might have been convicted for riot. Were the House to put faith in the evidence adduced on that trial, evidence which came from the most infamous of human kind? and yet on such was the Report founded. His honourable and learned friend had alluded to the opinion of Lord Falkland respecting spies, and he would set the sentiments of that noble lord against the practice of his Majesty's Ministers*. Were the most notorious criminals,

* The following extract from the "History of the Rebellion," (vol. ii. p. 274, folio edit.) will furnish the reader with the opinions of Lord Falkland and Lord Clarendon on this subject:—"Two things he (Lord Falkland) could never bring himself to, whilst he continued in that office (Secretary of State), that was to his death; for which he was contented to be reproached, as for omissions in a most necessary part of his place. The one, employing of Spies, or giving any countenance or entertainment to them. I do not mean such emissaries as with danger would venture to view the enemy's camp, and bring intelligence of their number, or quartering, or any particulars that such an observation can comprehend; but those, who, by communication of such guilt, or dissimulation of manners, wind themselves into such trusts and secrets as enable them to make discoveries. The other, the liberty of Opening Letters, upon a suspicion that they might contain matters of dangerous consequence. For the first, he would say, 'such instruments must be void of all ingenuity, and common honesty, before they could be of use; and afterwards they could never be fit to be credited; and that no single preservation could be worth so general a wound, and corruption of humane society, as the cherishing such persons would carry with it.' The last, he thought 'such a violation of the Law of Nature, that no qualification by Office could justify him in the trespass;'

dealers in human blood, to be believed when they stood forward as accusers of the people of England? How could any faith be put in their declarations? How was truth to be extracted from them? By what form of abjuration could the consciences of such beings be bound?—He wished the House to reflect, that there was a wide difference between that allegiance which was voluntarily paid, which was sanctioned by reason, and cherished by the liberal spirit of a free government, and that which was claimed and extorted by arbitrary power. He had, indeed, heard some gentlemen go so far as to say, that the people were in favour of this measure; but the people durst not speak; they were gagged; the press was silenced by ex-officio informations; and not content with all that, Ministers required an act to be passed to give them the power of imprisoning whom they pleased, and of depriving the country of trial by jury. His learned friend had remarked, that public liberty was never more felt and enjoyed than now. He would himself go farther. In spite of all the arbitrary measures which had been adopted, public liberty never flourished more than during the present reign. Of this he was sensible; but he was at the same time perfectly convinced that public liberty was never more in danger than at this moment, when the persons exercising the Government of the country pretended that they could not repress immorality and sedition by the ordinary laws, but came forward and called upon Parliament to give them extraordinary powers, and found a Parliament willing to give them those powers for such a purpose. He did not say that there might not be persons in the country who wished to sow the seeds of sedition; but if their efforts had any effect, it was because materials for them to work on had been prepared by Ministers, whose wasteful profusion on the one hand, and gross corruption on the other, tended to demoralize the public mind. It was their conduct that gave currency to the doctrines which had been so much complained of: whether those doctrines were wicked or visionary, or both, he should not now discuss. Nobody deplored more than he did that such notions should exist: but if it were demonstrated to him that there was no alternative between popular commotion on the one hand, and the constant suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act on the other, even under that dreadful alternative he would prefer the former as the less evil of the two. He solemnly declared that he would, at this moment, rather see the country revolutionized (hear, hear) than enslaved and and though he was convinced by the necessity, and iniquity of the time, that those advantages of information were not to be declined, and were necessarily to be practised, he found means to put it off from himself; whilst he confessed he needed excuse and pardon for the omission: so unwilling he was to resign any part of good Nature to an obligation in his Office."

bowed down under a system of despotism. A noble friend of his (Lord W. Russell) in speaking on these measures, had observed, "that we were not in a condition to part with any more liberty." (See page 590.) He was sorry to say, that we had parted with much of the spirit which had given birth to those liberties; much of that anxious solicitude and care for their preservation which had hitherto distinguished this country from all others; and much of that wholesome jealousy of power which had been bequeathed to us by our ancestors. He feared, indeed, that the public mind was now far too sensitive to popular commotion, and lamentably cold to the encroachments of arbitrary authority. He was afraid he had troubled the House too long (hear, hear) in endeavouring to state the grounds on which he should give his vote: grounds, however which had already been much better stated by others. He concurred with what had fallen from his learned friend (Sir Samuel Romilly) on this subject. These were times in which every public man who revered the rights and liberties which descended from his fathers, and who wished to transmit them to his children, ought to stand forward and oppose the arbitrary measures of Ministers. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lamb perfectly agreed with the noble lord in one sentiment which he had uttered, namely, that he would rather see the country revolutionized than enslaved. But the way to prevent the country from being enslaved, was, in his opinion, to adopt such protecting measures as that under consideration. If those who thought with him were accused of exaggerating facts, and placing every thing in too strong colours, on the other hand, it surely could not be said that the noble lord had understated his case. He had never undervalued the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Act, and would not consent to its suspension without the strongest reason; but he could not concur with the Member for Bristol, and others, in supposing that any difference between the present and the former Reports afforded a reason for not adopting the bill. If their opinion were founded on the idea that the conspiracy described in the first Report was ripe for explosion, that had not been the foundation of his. It would be recollected, that he had laid very little stress on the Report. He had given his opinion on a consideration of the spirit of the times, and the language held at public meetings, some of which were adjourned from time to time. What had been stated at those meetings respecting Parliamentary Reform, and the declarations that they were to resort to physical force, if their petitions were rejected, indicated a most dangerous spirit. In fact, the petitions which had been presented to that House were not petitions for Reform but for Revolution, since they prayed for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. He did not mean to say that all who signed these petitions desired a revolution; some of them might be well-meaning but mistaken enthusiasts; but he would assert that, in the general acceptance of the word, revolution must be the result of that change which Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage would create, and which would inevitably be followed by a military despotism. This unfortunate situation of things, arising from the spirit and temper of the times, was greatly aggravated by the manner in which the press was too generally conducted. He did not mean, in saying this, to pronounce an indiscriminate censure. He was aware that there were many instances of moderation, candour, and great ability, in the management of periodical publications; and he made much excuse for the haste in which daily papers were printed; for he believed that, in consequence of the want of time, articles frequently appeared, the insertion of which was afterwards regretted. Still, however, it was reasonable to consider the press, and, in particular, that part which was printed on Sunday, as tending greatly to foster discontent in the country. With respect to the latter publications, he had long observed, that they studiously threw into the back ground all that was excellent in the law and Constitution of the country, and brought forward in the most aggravated colours, every thing which could be rendered a topic of complaint. This practice, too, was always carried on with particular activity during the prorogation of Parliament, when the statements which were hazarded could not experience so ready or complete a refutation. It was common to speak of the power of the press, and he admitted that its power was great. He should, however, beg leave to remind the conductors of the press of their duty to apply to themselves a maxim which they never neglected to urge on the consideration of Governments—"that the possession of great power necessarily implies great responsibility." They stood in a high situation, and ought to consider justice and truth the general object of their labours, and not yield themselves up to their interests or their passions. His friends would, perhaps, reproach him with instigating Ministers to curb the press; but nothing, he assured them, was farther from his mind. He was aware of the great benefit which the country derived from the liberty of the press, and nothing could induce him to concur in any measure that might tend to injure it; at the same time he was free to confess, that its conduct had an influence on the vote which he gave on the present question. With regard to the statements in the Reports, though his vote was not founded on them, he believed them to be generally correct. The Manchester plot had been ridiculed, but ridicule was no argument. It was certain the insurrection in Derbyshire had taken place, as described, and that, too, before Oliver had appeared in the country. If he was the only leader in these disturbances, did he give the people the previous animus also? Some gentlemen expected that a plentiful harvest would restore tranquillity to the country, and he hoped it would; but if that should not be the case, it would then be necessary to consider what other remedies could be resorted to: whether some measures limited to the districts in which the disorder chiefly prevailed ought not to be adopted.

Mr. Macdonald felt himself bound to give his most decided opposition to this measure. The House was now called upon, not to follow a precedent, but to establish a precedent: for, notwithstanding all that the hon. gentleman on the opposite side had alleged, there was no analogy whatever between the present and former times in which this great security of English freedom had been suspended. Blackstone—no very warm defender of popular rights—had expressly declared, that the power which his Majesty's Ministers were now demanding was only to be exercised in cases of extreme emergency. (Hear, hear, hear.) What then, should the representatives of the people, should the guardians of public liberty, consent to invest them with this enormous authority in times like these, when the country was at peace with all the world, when no domestic rebellion existed, when the throne was filled by a Monarch whose title was undisputed, and, consequently, when no emergency whatever existed for this measure? The noble lord opposite (Castlereagh) was already possessed of the most ample means of securing the internal tranquillity of the empire: he was now a peace Minister, and he had what the hon. member most sincerely hoped no peace Minister would be ever allowed to have again, a large standing army at his command. (Hear, hear.) If the noble lord, therefore, could not preserve the tranquillity of the country, there was reason enough why he should be removed (hear, hear.); but there was no reason why he should be appointed dictator. (Hear, hear, hear.) He (Mr. M.) desired the House to bear in mind, that Princes and Ministers were but men, and that extraordinary power could not be intrusted to them without great danger. The liberty of the subject had been obtained with great difficulty by our ancestors, and it behoved us to cling to it with almost a desperate grasp. (Hear, hear.) The recent circumstances of the world had unfortunately made us too familiar with the arbitrary and despotic views of Kings and Ministers. The league of military monarchs, a league to which England had the glory of having become a party, was an unerring proof of the intentions of the crowned heads of Europe towards their deluded subjects, who had been called upon to take up arms, and shed their blood in the cause of independence. (Hear, hear.) What the conduct of our Ministers had been, it was scarcely necessary for him to repeat; but the country would never forget, that they had sent down the representative of the Sovereign, at the opening of the last session of Parliament, with an ironical declaration, that the state of the United Kingdom afforded great cause for congratulation: that the revenue had been considerably increased, and that commerce and manufactures were in the most prosperous condition.

The framers of this speech were afterwards obliged to retract their assertions; but in no one instance whatever had they adopted the smallest economy, until they were actually forced by the loud and unanimous voice of a suffering people. (Hear, hear, hear.) "Such was their conduct last session: and now, when they admitted that the greatest distress prevailed among all classes of the community, what did they do? They appointed a Committee of disaffection first, and a Committee of retrenchment afterwards. And yet these were the men who now called upon the people to confide in their integrity, their wisdom, their impartiality, while at the same time they endeavoured to set up prerogative against the law. (Shouts of hear.) "Sir," said the hon. member, "if such a bill as I now hold in my hand be suffered to pass, it will raise such a flame in England as who shall undertake to quench? I most earnestly hope that the House will still pause, and consider what is due to themselves and to the people. Let us retract our errors, and retrace our steps, and substitute measures of general conciliation. (Hear, hear.) Let us teach the people rather to admire the strength and sturdiness of the Constitution than its pliability, as the President of the Board of Control has called it, by which he means nothing more than that you may turn and twist it as you please. (Loud cheering.) Sir, unless we do this, unless we preserve to the people that personal freedom and independence which have raised the English character above that of all other nations in the world, we may build Waterloo bridges and Waterloo monuments, but the spirit which conquered at Waterloo will be no more. (Repeated cheers.) Hereafter, the returns from Manchester and Nottingham are to fix the assize of British freedom, and the liberties of the country will be held at the will of Ministers, a tenure not to be found in the laws of England. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I implore the House not to consent to this odious measure, not to make that fatal precedent which the Ministers require: I call on them to set a just value on their liberties, and carefully to transmit them to posterity, as the noblest inheritance of mankind." (Loud and repeated cheers.)

Colonel Stanhope said, this was a question between the friends of freedom and the friends of arbitrary power. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) But he was a friend of freedom, and he believed that this measure was calculated to secure the peace and happiness of the country. (Hear, hear.) The question depended upon the necessity of the measure, and whether there was any other remedy. For his part, he placed the utmost reliance on the Committee of Secrecy, and on the Report which they had made. The main cause of the disaffection which had appeared arose from the distress of the country; but though he admitted that the people of England had borne their sufferings with great fortitude, it was necessary to save them from the effects of their own phrenzy. He should, therefore, vote for the third reading of the bill.

Sir F. Burdett said, that notwithstanding all that had been urged by those who supported this measure, it would be difficult for him to collect, from any set of gentlemen, what the real danger was which they apprehended. Some described it to be of one kind, some of another; while a third class created phantoms in their own minds of something which they did not distinctly know, or which they did not clearly set forth to others. It must be admitted, however, that the hon. gentleman below (Mr. Lamb) had stated plainly and manfully his notions of the danger: he was the only one who had declared openly and broadly that this coercive measure was an answer to those numerous petitions of the people with which the table of that House had been covered. (Hear, hear.) He had indulged the House at considerable length, and with no small degree of vehemence, with assertions of the idle, wild, absurd, and revolutionary objects which the petitioners had in view; so that he and his friends did not venture to impose on the House by false arguments, although they usurped on those sacred rights, to which, as long as he (Sir Francis) had any breath, he would maintain that the people of England were entitled. (Hear.) The hon. gentleman had contended strongly against a Reform of Parliament; but let the people remember that the hon. gentleman himself was a borough-nominee. (Hear.) He might think, no doubt, that he discharged his duty to his constituents, but he (Sir F.) would also do his, notwithstanding the opposition of the borough-mongers in that House, called, nominally, the Commons' House of Parliament. To them he had taken no oath of fidelity, to them he owed no allegiance whatever; but he owed to them eternal hostility, and he would never cease from his exertions to procure a more adequate representation of the people. (Hear, hear.) The way in which the hon. gentleman had put this question brought it to an issue with the people of England, whether it was high treason for them to desire to be represented in that House. The noble lord and his colleagues might carry this measure; but if they succeeded, this country would be placed in a situation in which no people on earth would be hereafter disposed to envy its inhabitants. The original act stated in the preamble, what he held to be a direct falsehood: it said, that "a traitorous conspiracy has been carried on, with a view to subvert the Constitution of the country." Now, there was an absolute persuasion throughout the people of this country, of the necessity of a Reform in Parliament, but there was no conspiracy against the Government. What could be thought, however, of a Government that employed spies to go about the country to excite disaffection, and rewarded them for such diabolical conduct? He held in his hand a great many letters from respectable persons in many parts of the country, giving an account of the mission of Oliver, and others like him, and stating, that he had been attempting to entrap persons into acts which were now alleged in justification of the measure which the House was going to adopt. (Hear, hear.) With respect to spies being necessary to a Government, he begged to remind the House that they were not employed in America, the only free Government that now existed. Let the House look to what this new principle of Government would lead. Whatever Ministers might think of it, such strength was really weakness. (Hear.) If we were to go on in this way, suspending the rights of the people, severity would beget discontent; and as that discontent would furnish a plea for additional severity, there would be no end to the system. What! would the persons who directed the Government of this country never learn wisdom? Did they wish to adopt and persevere in a system which had produced such scenes of horror, misery, and blood, in a neighbouring country? Could the House have forgotten what occurred in Ireland under the auspices of the noble lord (Castlereagh) opposite? He had several affidavits in his hand, taken in that country, which, with the leave of the House, he would read. The first of them was made by John Hevey, tobacco and snuff manufacturer in Dublin, who stated, "That on the 4th of June, 1798, when Lord Castlereagh was First Secretary of State to the Lord Lieutenant, deponent was arrested by a military party, and taken to the Royal Exchange, which was then converted into a prison and place for the infliction of torture upon persons suspected, or said to be suspected, of treasonable practices. Saith, that at said period, deponent was of the age of 24 years or thereabouts, and the partner of his father in the brewing business, which deponent superintended, and the net profits of which amounted to about 3,000*l.* per annum, as deponent believes. Deponent saith, that whilst deponent was at the said Royal Exchange, he was required by Dean Beresford to give information to Government as to treasonable persons and practices, who thereupon told deponent, he would serve himself by complying, or words to that effect; and at the same time, Henry Charles Sitt, Esquire, then Town Major of Dublin, and a resident in the Castle, (and having daily communications, as deponent understood and believes, with said Lord Castlereagh and the other efficient members of the Irish Government,) threatened to hang deponent. Saith, that after deponent had been confined at the said Royal Exchange for about two days, he was removed to the Prevot, where he remained about seven weeks, and was from thence transmitted to Kilkenny gaol.—Saith, that the night before deponent's departure from the Prevot for Kilkenny, William Sandys (then Brigade-major and Prevot-marshal) sent his servant in deponent's name, to deponent's house, for his (deponent's) horse, which was of the value of fifty guineas, or thereabouts, and which he accordingly got; and said Sandys, about the moment of deponent's departure, told deponent, that he would never return from Kilkenny, as he would most certainly be hanged, or words to that import and effect. Saith, that deponent was, soon after his arrival at Kilkenny, tried by a Court Martial, and sentenced to transportation to Botany Bay, as it was notified to him, and was convicted by said Court Martial of being an United Irishman, upon the evidence of two witnesses, one of whom was under sentence of death, but promised pardon, as deponent understood and believes, for so swearing against deponent, although deponent positively saith, he never had in his life any communication or conversation about politics with the said witness; and the said other witness was confessedly perjured. Saith, that upon deponent's having heard of said extraordinary sentence, he immediately communicated it to his friends and relatives in Dublin, by whom, as deponent understood and believes, every effort was made to obtain an explanation of the grounds upon which it was passed, without effect; and at length deponent's sister having presented a memorial to Lord Cornwallis (then at the head of the Irish Government), that nobleman was pleased to issue an order for deponent's liberation, grounded upon a revision by his lordship, of the Minutes of the said Court Martial, and a Certificate to deponent's loyalty and general good conduct and character, from the officers of the Roebuck Corps of Yeomanry Cavalry, which was, as deponent verily believes, one of the most respectable corps in the county of Dublin, and of which deponent was at the time a member.—Saith, that sometime after deponent's said sentence, he was waited upon by General Sir Charles Asgill, who then commanded the Kilkenny district, who stated his supposition that deponent was perfectly satisfied with the justice of his sentence, at which deponent having expressed surprise, the General then observed, 'We are told, Mr. Hevey, that you are about to memorial Lord Cornwallis for your liberation, but you are not likely to succeed: you are that sort of a man whom Government would wish to send out of the country, and, to prevent any further trouble, we will rescind that part of the sentence which relates to your transportation to Botany Bay, provided you will quit Ireland for seven years,' or words to that effect; to which proposition, deponent declined to accede; and upon the following day, the said order of Lord Cornwallis for deponent's release, was communicated to him. Saith, that upon deponent's return from Kilkenny, having met said Major Sandys, on Arran Quay, Dublin, in company with Lord Enniskillen, deponent demanded from him his said horse, which, however, said Major Sandys, in an indignant tone of voice, refused to return, alleging that neither he (deponent) nor any other traitor should ever ride said horse, or words to that effect. Saith, that deponent thereupon commenced an action at law against said Sandys, for recovery of said horse, or the value thereof, upon which deponent received a note from Mr. Edward Cooke, the then Under Secretary, and confidential friend of Lord Castlereagh, and the brother in law of said Sandys, as deponent understood and believes, desiring to see deponent, and deponent having accordingly waited upon said Cooke, was by him indignantly asked, whether deponent was not going to law with an officer of the Government, and upon deponent's observing in answer, that he was only endeavouring by legal means to recover his property, said Cooke then exclaimed, 'By God, Mr. Hevey, we will hang you yet—I can lay my finger, Sir, upon a certain paper, to shew you that you are still in our power,' or words to that import. But upon deponent's saying he defied him to do so, he and his agents having already done all in their power to hang him, said Cooke then said he would send for Major Sandys, and inquire into the transaction. Deponent saith, he heard nothing further from either said Cooke or said Sandys, until the trial of the action so commenced by deponent against the latter was about to take place, when deponent's law agent received a notification from Mr. Kemmis, the Crown Solicitor, and agent for said Sandys in the transaction, that deponent's said horse should be restored, and all the law expenses paid: which restoration and repayment took place accordingly. Deponent saith, that whilst he was in confinement, both at the Prevot and in Kilkenny, he experienced much rigour; and during his captivity in the former place, he saw several persons tied up and whipped, without any trial, as deponent believes, in order (as was avowed) to extort confession of guilt in themselves, or others from them, and amongst the persons so treated, deponent recollects a Mr. Leach. Deponent saith, that from the frequent occurrence of said usage of whipping and torture at the barracks, and various parts of Dublin, he is convinced in his conscience, and verily believes, that such practice was resorted to under the sanction of Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Cooke, and other efficient members of the Irish Government; and further saith, that whilst in confinement at Kilkenny as aforesaid, said Sir Charles Asgill refused deponent the allowance usually granted to persons in his situation, although deponent applied for same, conceiving himself to be entitled thereto, same having heretofore been usually granted to various persons similarly circumstanced as deponent.

[The hon. baronet was proceeding to read other affidavits to the same effect, when he was interrupted by the impatience of the ministerial side of the House.] No doubt, he continued, these exposures were not pleasant to the noble lord and his friends; but the House ought to know what had been done under similar cir-circumstances in Ireland, and what might be expected, sooner or later, here. The affidavits which he had been about to submit were from individuals who had themselves been victims to the torture, and the whole story was one of the blackest in the annals of the most despotic country: it seemed, however, that the House had not patience to listen to it, and no wonder, considering the distressing nature of the detail. He had, however, offered them, because he thought it was the duty of Parliament to trace the bloody steps which the Ministry had pursued, especially when it was recollected that the hands of the noble lord opposite, to which this measure was now to be intrusted, were as deeply dyed in the bloody transactions of that time, as those of any other member of the then existing Government. (Hear, hear.) Another individual, who bore no inconsiderable share in the horrid deeds about that period, was one of those atrocious spies whom Ministers thought fit to employ—the notorious Mr. Reynolds, whose activity and services no native of Ireland could forget; yet this odious informer was found upon the grand jury who had brought in a true bill for high treason against men who had since been acquitted. By an act passed in the reign of Henry IV. all persons who had received the royal pardon, or had taken sanctuary for treason, were excluded from grand juries; and Lord Coke had recorded the case of a man named Scarlet, who, on this account, was held by all the judges to be incapacitated for that duty. Whether Mr. Reynolds had been pardoned or not, he did not know; but certain he was, that he had taken sanctuary against treason among his Majesty's Ministers, and, therefore, his presence on the grand jury ought to have vitiated the indictment. Such men as he could never come within the words of the Great Charter, probi et legales homines. Instead of a conspiracy existing against the Government, it was now found that the Government had entered into a conspiracy against the people; and though the practice was not uncommon in these pure times, of dressing up voters at elections, the late trial afforded the first instance on record where a witness had been dressed up by the Government for the purpose of imposing upon a jury, by a false show of independence and respectability. (Hear, hear.) True it was, that, by possibility, an informer might be a conscientious man; but spies who were hired and clothed did not even come within that class: their business was, where they could not find evidence, to make it to the satisfaction of their employers. The noble lord opposite had said that he would employ spies, notwithstanding their presence might perhaps destroy the social comforts of traitors. (See p. 1482.) It was easy to understand what were the social comforts of cabinet dinners, at which the plans were arranged for despatching ministerial spies over the country; but what were the social comforts of traitors was not quite so intelligible, except to the noble lord. A more detestable system could not be imagined than that of spies and informers. He would much rather that the Habeas Corpus Act were repealed entirely, than that by its suspension any additional powers should be given to Ministers. If the Habeas Corpus Act did not exist, the people would be left to the old remedies; they might be more circuitous, but they arrived at the wished-for end at last—the trial and liberation of the accused; but, under the suspension, Ministers might imprison the King's subjects just as long as they liked; that is, as long as the bill lasted, which they would continue from time to time while it suited their convenience. (Hear.) The old law punished the guilty, but the new the innocent; the old law allowed the prisoners to be visited by their friends, but the new introduced solitary as well as indefinite confinement. He would rather empower Ministers to put men to death at once than thus to seclude them: because the executions would be public, in the face of day, and abuse would be less possible. (Hear, hear.) At present they did not even know the numbers of their victims; many of whom, like the wretches formerly buried in the dungeons of the Bastille, might be forgotten until their dreary silence was broken in upon by some popular commotion. (Hear.) He had been astonished to hear this measure supported by an honourable and religious member, who made superior pretensions to piety, because the spirit of it was not only unchristian, but inhuman: it not only opposed all the ordinary rules of morality, but every maxim of piety and religion. While that honourable and religious member was haranguing in favour of the bill, he seemed to have forgotten all the professions he had previously made of charity and humanity. Did he not recollect the pathetic expostulation of our Saviour, "I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was naked, and ye clothed me not; I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me not?" In this appeal there was something irresistibly touching: it adverted to two of the greatest calamities that could afflict human nature—sickness and imprisonment, without any of the consolations of which our nature stood so much in need. Yet they seemed to have lost their effect upon the honourable and religious member, when he lent his aid to men, who not only neglected to perform the offices of charity themselves, but refused to allow others to perform them. (Hear, hear.) The hon. and religious member seemed also to have forgotten that one of the sacred writers, describing the machinations of the enemies of our Saviour, related that, "They watched him and sent forth spies which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him into the power and authority of the Governor." (Hear, hear, hear.)—One purpose of the bill now before the House was to intimidate, and to prevent meetings and petitions for Reform; and to accomplish this object the more effectually, Ministers were empowered, and this constituted another insuperable objection to the measure, not only solitarily to confine, but to send their prisoners to distant gaols, to change them about from gaol to gaol, to exhibit them in chains from one end of the kingdom to the other. Not a long time had elapsed since the hon. and religious member had been most laudably active in ameliorating the condition of the slaves of Africa; and how happened it that he was not now at all shocked at beholding his own countrymen—Englishmen, dragged about in fetters, treated worse than slaves, because with a stronger sense of injustice and cruelty, and that without the shadow of a crime? (Loud cheers.) Recently, the population of the country from London to Manchester had been gratified with these exhibitions; and when the prisoners arrived at the office of the Home Secretary, they were received in a most complaisant manner by a very civil gentleman, who, having nothing to say against them, again despatched them through the kingdom, in another direction, as a sort of warning to the inhabitants. A noble lord (Folkestone) the other night had adverted to a case of this kind; an unhappy individual, who, having had the satisfaction of an introduction to Lord Sidmouth, had been immured in Reading gaol, with no prospect but the chimney-tops, and no society but his gaoler. But it had been said, that this individual was deranged, and surely he had suffered enough to drive him mad. The language of the law was, that, before trial, men were confined ad custodiam, non ad panam; but here every thing was reversed. The safeguard of the prisoners had originally belonged to the sheriff, but modern acts of Parliament had given a jurisdiction to magistrates: by the measure before the House even magistrates were now to be excluded, and the Secretary of State was at once gaoler, sheriff, magistrate, and minister. What kind of Government could that be where this jealousy of communication existed; where men were imprisoned au secret, as the French termed it; and where they were not only prevented from seeing their friends, but from reading books?—even this last resource was not allowed them. One honourable member had asserted that the suspension was necessary, because the people were so ill educated. Such imprisonment was, indeed, severe discipline; but how education was to be promoted by solitary confinement, without the use of books, was a question he should find it difficult to answer. (Cheers.) The whole was a system of the most wicked and wanton torture; and how could men of sense assert that there was no danger of abuse, when from the beginning to the end it was nothing but abuse, and that under the flimsy pretext of two Reports of Committees, who had taken the utmost care that not a syllable should be inserted that could tend to disalarm the country, for that was the expressive word of a noble lord. Every step that had been induced by the low artifices of Government—their spies and informers—their treason-hunters and treason-makers—their rewards and blood-money, were all a part of the same system. A great deal had been said in the course of these debates upon the designs of the Luddites, but he warned the House against a more real and greater danger from the efforts of the Bloodites.

Mr. Lamb explained; observing, that his remarks only applied to the petitions for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage.

Mr. Wilberforce said, he would not have troubled the House, but for a sort of call made upon him by the hon. baronet, who was greatly mistaken if he thought that the sarcasms he had used did not rather injure himself than others. It was not always those who talked the loudest and the longest about their love and admiration of the Constitution that were the most sincere in their professions (hear); and he could assure the hon. baronet, and those for whose good opinion he was more solicitous, that he had painfully and reluctantly brought his mind to consent to the measure before the House. In the present circumstances of the country, it appeared to him, that it would be most dangerous, when Parliament was dismissed, to set at large those who had long been employed in spreading poisons that had already attacked the vitals of the Constitution. He could scarcely believe it possible, that even the hon. baronet should speak with levity of the first Report, which shewed undeniably that the feelings of Englishmen had been so perverted, that they could now look without horror at the most atrocious crimes; that private assassination was become familiar to them; and that they did not even shrink from assassination for hire. (Hear, hear.) Were these principles which men ought to be allowed to circulate, or which could be circulated without danger? If any fear could be entertained of the establishment of absolute power in this country, it would arise from that very source; other times and other countries proved it; and if any man, or any body of men, wished to make a tyrant firm upon his throne, no better mode could be adopted than to employ a man of popular talents, and possessing public confidence, who would go all lengths, and who, when the flame of discord was beginning its ravages, would choose that opportunity of scattering his firebrands. (Loud cheers.) The hon. bart. himself, while braving about the liberties of his country, was deceiving the people to their ruin, and destroying that freedom which he professed so ardently to admire. He (Mr. W.) voted for the measure, because in his conscience he believed that, without it, the Constitution might sustain an injury which no subsequent exertions could repair. He granted that, in the view, the practices now carried on were not so dangerous as those of 1715 or 1745; but though there were now no great and efficient leaders, it was the more difficult on that very account to calculate the number of the opponents of regular Government. When the purpose was, in the first place, to destroy all moral principles among the people, who could say to what extent the mischief might spread? In voting for the bill, as he had before remarked, he had acted unwillingly, but from a commanding sense of duty; and religion itself taught him this lesson—to value the blessings at present enjoyed in this country, and to endeavour to hand them down unimpaired to posterity. (Cheers.)

Sir G. Webster rose for the purpose of entering his solemn protest against the passing of this bill. A noble lord (Nugent) had asserted, that he would rather witness a popular commotion than the enslavement of his country, and the observation had been cheered as inconsistent with a due regard for the Constitution; but in confirmation of the sentiment, he begged to refer to a speech of a man whose name was coupled not only with the liberty but the glory of his country—the great Lord Chatham—who, in a speech delivered in the House of Peers on the 9th of Jan. 1770, at the beginning of the American war, had used these remarkable words—“It is an obligation incumbent upon this House to inquire into the causes of the notorious dissatisfaction expressed by the whole English nation, to state those causes to their sovereign, and then to give him their best advice in what manner he ought to act. The privileges of the greatest and the meanest subjects stand upon the same foundation: it is, therefore, our highest interest, as well as our bounden duty, to watch over and protect the rights of the people. The liberty of the subject, I say, is invaded, my lords, not only in our distant provinces, but at home. The people are loud in their complaints; they demand redress, and until the injuries they have received are redressed, they will never return to a state of tranquillity: nor ought they; for, in my judgment, my Lords, and I speak it boldly, better were it for them: to perish in a glorious contention for their rights, than to purchase a slavish tranquillity at the expense of a single iota of the Constitution.” (Hear, hear, hear.) Ministers were now aiming at the destruction of the Constitution, and were themselves committing that treason which, by hired spies, they were attempting to charge against others. (Cheers.) They were feeling the temper of the people of England step by step, in order to ascertain how far it was possible to establish arbitrary power among them. (Cheers.)

The Lord Mayor adverted to the facility with which the riots in the city had been suppressed by the civil power, before the arrival of the military. He said, that he had applied to the Tower for some soldiers, and forty men were sent in consequence, but they were soon recalled for the protection of the fortress, which was thought to be so fearfully threatened by the populace.

The Lord Advocate rose to vindicate himself from a charge that had been brought against him. (See p. 1491.) He complained, that though he had been attacked in his absence, no one had said a word that evening, though he had sat there seven hours; and he therefore feared that an attack was to be made again, when it would be too late for him to reply. By the law of Scotland, sixty days may elapse after a party is indicted, and before he is tried. The prisoner Mackinlay was charged with treason and felony; and therefore, if separate indictments had been framed, the prisoner might have been delayed above a hundred days; but he had joined the two offences in one indictment for the ease and advantage of the prisoner. Was it fair, therefore, to insinuate that he had been guilty of oppression in this case? It had been stated by a learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly,) that prisoners had been removed from one gaol to another, for the purpose of secluding them from their friends and acquaintance. But the fact was, that they were placed in a particular prison, because it was the most healthy in Edinburgh, and the district prison was extremely unwholesome. So far from refusing admission to the friends of the prisoners, not only all those whom the prisoners asked to see were admitted to them, but many whom they did not ask to see. To gain admission to prisoners, an application to the Court of Justiciary is necessary, if the consent of the Lord Advocate is not obtained, but he undertook to look into every application himself, and always signed his consent on the spot. He could state on the authority of one of the counsel for the prisoners, and one of the most bustling and active of the counsel, who was not now in his place, (Mr. J. P. Grant) that the prisoners were never better treated in their lives than they were when under confinement. With respect to another statement, that an individual had been twice on his trial for the same offence, and was about to be tried a third time—that the indictment had been twice quashed for informality; and that by the law of Scotland a man might be a thousand times brought to trial for the same offence without control; he rather thought the memory of the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) must have failed him since he studied the law of Scotland, (hear, hear,) or he never could have stated that a prosecutor could abandon an indictment without the consent of the Court, on his stating to the Court at the same time, that he intended to proceed to a new trial. It was in the breast of the Court to say whether or not the motion of the prosecutor should be agreed to. So far, therefore, from bringing a man up a thousand times, he could not bring him up a second time, unless the Court themselves were party to the measure. This, the hon. and learned gentleman, if he doubted it, would find stated in Mr. Hume's book, as a matter so clear, that no authority was even referred to in support of it. It had been said that two indictments were quashed on account of informality. Now he had to state, that not one was quashed on account of informality, and there was not a vestige of authority for saying so.

Mr. Methuen rose to call the learned lord to order.—The question before the House was the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and not the conduct of the learned lord.

Sir S. Romilly conceived that it would be unfair in the extreme if the learned lord were not allowed to proceed in his statement.

The Lord Advocate continued. He said, he had never delayed bringing prisoners to trial. The English law of treason was not well understood in Scotland, but he denied that under the law of that country a man could be tried more than once*. He should be happy to give any further explanation, if required. The gentlemen who had attacked him were present; but perhaps they waited to attack him again, when he could make no reply.

The Speaker rose to order, and reminded the learned lord that he had fallen into an irregularity, and was transgressing the bounds of explanation; he would see the necessity of not proceeding further in a direct reference to a former debate.

Sir S. Romilly said, nothing could have been farther from his intention than to attack the learned lord. He had merely put a question, with a view to obtain explanation. He was astonished that the English law of treason was not understood by the Scotch Crown lawyers, who were bound by their oath to know it. As to abstaining from repeating his statements that evening in the presence of the noble lord, he had done so, because, with all due courtesy, he thought the learned lord's affairs less important than a question affecting the Constitution of the country.

Mr. Brougham believed the speeches which had given the greatest offence to the learned lord, were not those of himself or his learned friend, but the speeches of the members for Lanarkshire and for Glasgow. The learned lord complained of the hardship of not having the charge followed up against him that night: "You see—I am ready. You see I am come up from Scotland. I have been sitting here seven hours, and yet in all that time you have never ventured to come forward to impeach me." He was quite sure, if he had done so, while such a question was before the House, the House would not have allowed him to go on five minutes. The learned lord accused him of ignorance of the Scotch law. Now, he held in his hands a printed Report of the trial in Scotland, by which it appeared that the learned lord himself was during this trial acting upon what he (Mr. Brougham) had supposed to be the Scotch law;

* By the law of Scotland, a man once remitted to the knowledge of an assize, cannot be again remitted to the knowledge of another assize, for committing the same fact, under a different description of crime—as may be done in England, though he be acquitted, or even though he be convicted.

but the prisoner's counsel got a light which the learned lord had also now got, and objected that the Lord Advocate had no power to desert an indictment without an interlocutor of the Court. When this objection was stated, one learned judge, (Lord Gillies,) was inclined to be of the same opinion, but the majority of the Lords of Justiciary were inclined to think that the objection was not well founded; that is, that the Lord Advocate, if he thought fit, might abandon the indictment, and so, in point of fact, bring the prisoner into court a thousand times. The Records, however, were ordered to be searched, and the result was, that all the judges came over to the opinion of the small minority*.

* Andrew M'Kinlay has been since brought to trial. His case was argued, and decided, in the High Court of Justiciary, at Edinburgh, on the 18th and 19th of July. On the former day, the relevancy of the indictment was debated, in consequence of written informations (the usual proceedings in such cases) having been given in. The panel was indicted under the 52 Geo. 3. c. 104, for having administered to several persons at Glasgow an unlawful oath: (viz. the oath which the Lord Advocate read in the House of Commons on the 26th of February.—(see page 352.) By that statute, to administer unlawful oaths is a capital felony; and, therefore, the panel was charged with having administered the oath wickedly and feloniously: (the word traitorously, which was in the former indictments, being omitted.) It is scarcely possible, in the limits of a note, to give even an outline of the various objections taken by the counsel for the panel, and debated by the Judges.

The most interesting questions were:—Whether the oath as set forth in the indictment, was of the description alleged? Did it purport, or intend to bind to commit any treason, or murder, or any capital felony? (The oath was materially altered in the indictment:—to the words "physical strength," the prosecutor had added, in a parenthesis, "or force.") If it should appear, that the oath was, or might be of the description alleged, was it incumbent on the prosecutor to specify in the indictment the crime, to the commission of which, he stated, that the oath imported an obligation? Did the offence disclosed in the indictment, as explained by the prosecutor, amount to a case of treason? And if so, could it or ought it to be tried as a felony?

Lord Gillies said, it was impossible to read the whole of the oath without thinking it probable, that it imported the alleged obligation to commit a capital crime; but the presumption in favour of innocence was not to be redargued by mere suspicion. "This presumption (said he) has been too lightly treated by the prosecutor. I think that Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage would lead to anarchy, and would issue in military despotism: but because we think the end would destroy the constitution, we must not infer that treason would be the means to be employed in attaining it; and of the end itself, there have been persons, and those of consideration, who have entertained a different opinion. The Duke of Richmond introduced a bill into the House of Peers, the preamble of which stated, that Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments were the birth-right of every Briton; but no one ever accused or suspected him of treason for so doing. The criminal nature of this oath is Lord Folkestone wished to know whether the bill would extend to Scotland, and how it stood as to cases of wrongous imprisonment. No Secretary of State now resided in Scotland. Would the Secretary of State's warrant be good there? It was necessary before the division to understand these matters.

The Lord Advocate said, there was not a vestige of doubt as to the applicability of the bill to Scotland. In former times there was a Scotch Secretary of State, and, for a century and a half, the warrants of a Scotch Secretary resident in London had operated in Scotland.

The House divided on the third reading—
Ayes . . 195 | Noes . . 65 | Majority . . 180
The bill was read a third time.

An amendment was then proposed by Mr. S. Wortley, with the approbation of Lord Castlereagh, to leave out the words, "the expiration of six weeks after the commencement of the next session of Parliament," for the purpose of inserting the words, "the first day of March 1818."

Mr. C. Wynn proposed an amendment to the inferred from the words 'physical strength,' but how do I know it was to be illegally exerted? Many instances may be figured of an exertion of 'physical strength,' for political purposes, for influencing the Legislature, where nothing illegal is done or attempted, and where nothing treasonable is to be committed. We have instances of the highest and of the lowest description. The other day we know that many misguided people of Manchester and its neighbourhood assembled with a view of marching to London, for purposes very absurd, perhaps illegal, but certainly they were not thereby guilty of treason, and this was no small exertion of physical strength. The great Lord Chatham, enfeebled by age and sickness, rose from his bed and went down to the House of Lords to employ the last remains of his physical strength in endeavouring, by his eloquence, to arrest the progress of Councils, which he deemed dangerous and dishonourable to his country, and the exertion proved fatal to him.—The oath is now materially altered by adding the words 'or force.' This oath does appear to me to be one to which the Statute may apply; force imports violence. I think, though with some hesitation, that this oath, as it stands now, may import an obligation to commit a treason, or murder, or a capital felony.—But the prosecutor has not specified in the indictment the treason or the felony contemplated. Now I cannot hold an indictment on this statute relevant which does not explain what the crime is to which the oath binds. I cannot do so upon any principle of reason, or any principle of law. Mr. Hume has well explained the law of indictments.—As to the other point, that felony merges in treason, I cannot be permitted to say that I am ignorant of the law of England on this point, for it is the law of Scotland also. By the act of Anne, high treason must be tried in Scotland in the same manner as in England. But if it is tried here as a felony, the act of Anne is violated. It is said, that the last clause of the 52 Geo. 3. excludes the common law doctrine of felony merging in treason. I think this clause not unattended with difficulty; but, upon the whole, I do not think it goes far enough to support the prosecutor's argument. But I am clearly of opinion that the indictment is not relevant on the other grounds." Lord Hermand, Lord said amendment, to leave out all the words after the word "the," for the purpose of adding, "25th day of December, 1817." The House then divided on the question, that the words, "the first day of March, 1818," stand part of the bill. Ayes . . 152 | Noes . . 50 | Majority . . 102.

The bill was then passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE POOR AMENDMENT BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

Pitmilly, Lord Reston, and the Lord Justice Clerk thought the oath highly criminal, and that it was not incumbent on the prosecutor to specify the crime which it bound to commit. They doubted whether the doctrine of felony, merging in treason, had any application in Scotland: but, in this case, they thought the last clause of the act, on which the indictment was laid, was sufficient.

The relevancy of the indictment being thus established by a majority of the Court, on the following day McKinlay was put on his trial. Five witnesses, all of them prisoners in the Castle of Edinburgh, were called to prove that the panel had administered the oath to several persons. The first, John Campbell, being asked whether he had received any reward, or promise of reward, for the evidence which he was to give, answered, that he had. [The witness then detailed some of the means practised by the Procurator Fiscal (Mr. Salmon) and the Deputy Advocate (Mr. Drummond) in order to get him to confess his knowledge of the oath: but expressed his wish not to enter into any description of the ill usage, threats, and stratagems, practised upon him by the sheriff of Lanarkshire (Mr. Hamilton) to induce him to become a witness, by torturing him with the same questions, couched in different terms, which the Court agreed to.]

Mr. Jeffray (one of the panel's counsel) proposed to call Sir William Roe (Sheriff of Edinburgh) to corroborate certain parts of Campbell's declaration, which was opposed by the Lord Advocate as unnecessary.

The Court then decided that Campbell was an incompetent witness, as he came forward to give evidence under the impression that he was to receive a certain remuneration, or had made an agreement to that effect.

John McLaughlan, Peter Gibson, James Finlayson, and Hugh Dickson, were then called; but none of them established the case.

The examination of the last witness being concluded, the Lord Advocate rose and addressed the Court, stating, that in consequence of the testimony which the evidence had taken, he found that he could not receive the verdict which his former impressions had led him to expect.

The Jury returned a verdict, Not Proven.

Saturday, June 28.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

The Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill was returned from the Commons with an amendment, to which they desired the concurrence of the Lords.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that as this amendment, namely, that the duration of the bill should be limited to the 1st of March next, instead of six weeks after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, was of some importance, he did not feel justified in moving the consideration of it without some notice. He therefore gave notice, that he would call the attention of their lordships to it on Monday.

The Sheriffs (Ireland) Bill was read a second time, and several other bills were forwarded.

Monday, June 30.

MACHINERY.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition of certain labouring manufacturers, praying that, by taxation or otherwise, the use of machinery in manufactures might be discouraged. The noble earl stated, that he thought it his duty to present the petition, though he did not concur in the opinion of the petitioners, that the discouragement of machinery would be any benefit to them: at least, he was sure that it would be a great injury to the country.

The Earl of Lauderdale thought it of great consequence that persons in the situation of the petitioners should be aware, that this was not a subject on which persons on one side of the House thought one way, and persons on the other side another way, but a subject on which all those who had studied the matter, and were conversant with its principles, were perfectly agreed. There could be no doubt whatever, that without the use of machinery, one half of those who were now employed would be utterly destitute, and the petitioners, therefore, were blindly praying for that which, if granted, would contribute to their own destruction.

The petition was laid on the table.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS BILL.] On the motion of Lord Melville, this bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to-morrow.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] The order of the day having been read for taking into consideration the amendment made by the Commons, limiting the duration of the bill to the 1st March, 1818,

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that it had been thought more advisable in the House of Commons, to fix a determinate time for the expiration of this bill, than to leave it dependent upon contingencies connected with the meeting of Parliament. Had the amendment, however, materially shortened the time, he should have felt it his duty to oppose it; but as in the way the bill originally stood, it could not have continued longer than about the middle of March, or from thence towards April, he did not see any reason for objecting to the definite period of the 1st of March, and therefore moved to agree to the amendment.

The Marquis of Lansdown said, he did not mean now to renew the discussion upon this subject, trusting that the causes of discontent would ere long be removed, by a greater demand of labour, and the beneficial consequences of a favourable harvest. It was in this view that he thought it entirely unnecessary to continue this bill for so long a period, and he should therefore move, in order to record his opinion, to insert the 31st of December next, instead of the 1st of March, 1818.

The Earl of Donoughmore considered this measure an evil, and should therefore vote for giving it the shorter duration moved by his noble friend. He trusted, however, as the question now before the House involved the consideration of the manner in which the extraordinary powers entrusted to the Government had been exercised, that some information would be afforded upon certain points connected with the subject, and that some pledge would be given of its being intended to execute these powers with humanity and mildness towards the unfortunate individuals who might become the objects of it. A case had lately been publicly mentioned of which their lordships could not be ignorant, that of two individuals, father and son, of the name of Evans, who had been arrested by the warrant of the noble Secretary of State, and conveyed to the gaol in Surrey, where, it was stated, they were closely confined in dungeons, without the magistrates being allowed to visit them; that they had been heavily ironed, and that they had been deprived of the means of petitioning the other House of Parliament with regard to their situation. He did not mean to charge this upon the noble Secretary of State, but it appeared to have resulted from the acts of those officiating under him. What offence the two individuals alluded to had committed he knew not, but it would surely not be urged that any unnecessary harshness or severity ought to be used towards them; and it was the more incumbent to obtain some pledge as to the future exercise of the powers given by this measure, as, during the recess of Parliament, unfortunate individuals imprisoned under them, would have no means of giving publicity to their complaints.

Lord Sidmouth said, if it was required of him to give a pledge of a conduct different from that which he had hitherto adopted, it was utterly impossible. No orders for any unnecessary harshness or severity had ever been issued by him. With regard to the case of these two persons, the noble lord had been grossly imposed upon. He (Lord S.) in consequence of the statements that had been made regarding them, had sent for the gaoler of Horsemonger-lane, who had attended him that morning, when it clearly appeared, that the whole of what had been stated was a misrepresentation. So far from these individuals being confined in dungeons, they were placed in two light, airy rooms, 25 feet by 18, where they had every indulgence consistent with their situation. As to their being prevented from petitioning Parliament, this was also untrue. Had any obstruction been thrown in the way of their petitioning by the gaoler, the latter, so far as depended upon him should not have remained an hour longer in that situation. The fact, however, was directly the reverse. No obstruction whatever had been thrown in the way—they had all the means of petitioning; and it appeared by a certificate produced at his (Lord Sidmouth's) office by Mr. Harmer, that the petition, which, it was alleged, these individuals had been prevented from forwarding, had actually been presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Bennet in February last. Recently Mr. Harmer, before alluded to, a very respectable agent, called at his office, to request permission to be admitted to these persons, in order to engross a petition for them, to be presented to the House of Commons. Permission was immediately given, and the petition having been engrossed, was presented to the House of Commons on Friday last. Thus it appeared that the noble lord had been imposed upon from some quarter by a gross misrepresentation.

Earl Grosvenor observed, it was impossible to suppose that the noble viscount would subject individuals committed under the circumstances stated to any unnecessary harshness or severity, but though this undoubtedly applied to the noble viscount personally, it might not be applicable to some of those employed under him. He could not help observing, however, that the noble Secretary of State had not answered one point of charge regarding the treatment of these individuals, namely, that which related to their having been put in irons, and which he thought was an allegation material to be replied to. With regard to the bill, he should support the amendment moved by his noble friend, but he did not intend to go over again the grounds of opposition to the measure itself. He could not help, however, adverting to the employment of spies and informers which he considered as highly disgraceful to the Government, who thus hired men in the first instance to lie, and of whom nothing else could be expected, than that they would lie ever afterwards. He thought, upon this point, that the conduct of the noble duke (Bedford) when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (as mentioned in the debate of a former night) in rejecting the testimony of spies and informers was highly worthy of imitation.

Lord Montfort rose to bear testimony, as a magistrate of Surrey, to the conduct of the gaoler of Horsemonger-lane, whom he considered a humane and well-disposed individual.

Lord Sidmouth complimented the noble lord for the liberal, candid and just opinion which he had given respecting the gaoler of Horsemonger-lane. With regard to these persons having been put in irons, the fact was this: On their being committed, the gaoler, considering them in the same point of view as persons committed on similar charges, though not under similar circumstances, had in conformity with the established rules of the prison, put irons on them. Upon his (Lord Sidmouth's) being informed of the circumstance, he immediately issued orders for the irons to be taken off, which orders were executed within an hour after they were issued.

The Marquis of Lansdowne's amendment was then negatived, and the amendment made by the Commons agreed to without a division, and a Message ordered to be sent to them, stating that their lordships concurred in the amendment.—A Commission soon afterwards came down, and the Commons being in attendance, the Royal assent was given to the bill.

OFFICE ABOLITION, &c. BILLS. The Marquis of Lansdowne said, that before the noble earl (Liverpool) proceeded to move the committal of these bills, he wished to have some explanation as to the nature of them. The noble earl, as he understood, intended to move the committal of five bills, as forming parts of one whole. These bills were founded upon a Report made by a Committee of the House of Commons, which was now before their lordships; and on looking at that Report, he found that the abolition or regulation of a great number of offices was there recommended, which offices did not appear in these bills. Then, as to the Compensation Bill, whatever were its merits, it appeared that, by classing that with the other bills, the noble earl did not consider this as a partial measure, but as one whole; and yet there were offices to the extent of 30,000*l.* mentioned in the Report, which were not to be found in the bills. This was particularly the case with respect to certain offices in Ireland. He wished therefore, 1st, to know the reason why all the offices mentioned in the Report, were not included in the bills; 2d, whether, when it was said that these offices were to be abolished or regulated, as soon as the existing interests ceased, it was meant that they were to be so abolished or regulated, when what was called the vested interests, that was the interests for life, or for a term of years under the Crown grant, had ceased; 3d, whether the pensions already existing were to revert to the public at the end of the terms, or to be at the disposal of the Crown, to be granted anew?

The Earl of Liverpool answered to the first point, that these bills were, in some measure, founded on a Report made by a Committee of the House of Commons; but it did not follow that their lordships were bound to adopt all or any of the recommendations in that Report.—There were certain specific measures which might be afterwards adopted; such as the regulation of the office of Lord Justice-General in Scotland. There was another measure which ought certainly to originate in that House, if adopted at all—the regulation of the office of Clerk of Parliament; and as to the Irish offices, inquiries were depending respecting them, which rendered it impossible to have them regulated in the course of the present session. With regard to the term existing interests, it was applied in order to save the interests of those who were in possession of the offices. As to the pensions, if an individual previously held a pension, and became entitled to one under the Compensation Bill, the former would merge in the latter.

The Marquis of Launsdowne thought some further explanation necessary, regarding the term existing interests, as it appeared to him to be used in these bills in a distinct sense from vested interests, and that it was the first time Parliament had been called upon to allow existing interests to stand in the way of the regulation of offices, when these interests merely arose from an appointment during pleasure.

The Earl of Liverpool said, there was no question as to the competence of Parliament; the case was merely this: that it had been thought fit, under special circumstances, to make an exception in favour of existing interests.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that these particulars were more proper for the Committee.

The order of the day being then read,

The Earl of Liverpool proceeded to state the general ground upon which the bills rested: but he repeated, that their lordships were not bound to adopt the whole or any of them, or prevented from making such amendments as they thought proper. They would observe, that these bills, including the Compensation Bill, were to be considered as one measure. A bill of a nature somewhat similar, he was aware, had come to that House before; and if a bill were to come now in such a shape, he should certainly oppose it. He did not mean to say that there were not in that bill some valuable regulations; but it consolidated all sinecures, judicial and political, and went to abolish some most efficient offices; and adopted one of the most extravagant principles of compensation that could be conceived. It classed the office of Clerk of the Pells with that of the Lord Privy Seal, and was full of absurdities from beginning to end. The subject now came before their lordships in a very different shape. The principle upon which he recommended these bills to their attention was this—that whatever regulation of this kind might be adopted, there was a necessity for reserving to the Crown the means of rewarding public services; and he certainly would not have voted for these bills, if that had not been attended to. It had been observed, that this measure particularly affected the aristocracy; but in the Constitution of this country, it was impossible that any measure could affect one branch of it, without touching the other branches; and his opinion was, that if the Crown were deprived of the means of rewarding public services, the democratic part of the Constitution would be chiefly injured. The principal offices in the State would then be confined to a few persons; and men of talents and honourable ambition, without fortune, would be excluded. If they looked at those who had, for the most part, held the principal offices, and discharged the duties of those offices with the greatest advantage to their country, they would find that they were men of the latter description—he would say nothing as to the living; he would mention only the dead—Mr. Pelham, (in the reign of Geo. II.), Mr. George Grenville, the two Mr. Pitts, the ancestors of two noble barons, not now in the House, and a late friend of his, (meaning probably Mr. Perceval) whose memory he should ever honour and venerate both as a minister and a man. It would appear the more important, that such means of rewarding political services should be reserved to the Crown, when they considered the inadequacy of the salaries of the highest offices in the State. He appealed to noble lords on both sides of the House for the correctness of the assertion, when he said that the salaries of the highest offices were not more than half sufficient to meet the expenses attending them, with whatever moderation a person holding such office chose to live. He did not, however, mean to say, that it was expedient to augment the salaries of these offices; for if they were to be augmented, they must be so for men of large fortune as well as for those without fortune; and, therefore, the best arrangement, even with a view to economy, was to reserve to the Crown the means of rewarding political services. Having thus explained the first principle upon which he supported this measure, he now proceeded to the second, which was, that the rewarding of public services ought generally to rest with the Crown, instead of being left to Parliament. For a period of 50 years past, it had not been the general practice of Parliament to reward political services, during the life of any individual who might be thought deserving of such a reward. In some cases, Parliament had granted money to pay the debts of meritorious persons of this description, after their death; and, in the particular cases of Lord Chatham and Mr. Burke, had departed from its general practice of not rewarding political services during the lives of the individuals. But if it were the general practice of Parliament to reward political services by grants of money, during the lives of the individuals, to what abuses would such a practice not be liable? If some partiality in these cases appeared on the part of the Crown, that objection would apply in a much greater degree to parliamentary grants. A certain number of offices had been before at the disposal of the Crown, and they knew the precise extent to which the Crown could go.—Under these bills they would have the same advantage, as the amount of pensions was limited: but the public would have no such security if the matter were left to Parliament. Suppose any abuse of the power to exist on the part of the Crown, the extent of the power and of the abuse was limited; but it was otherwise with Parliament. From what he himself had seen, the last thing he should propose would be to intrust the consideration in this view of particular cases to large bodies. Any one who had been but half the time in Parliament that he had sat there, could not but agree with him in this. The best arrangement, therefore, was, to give the Crown the power of rewarding political services, to be exercised on the responsibility of Ministers; and then, supposing the power to be in some cases abused, they would know the full extent to which abuse could be carried. Upon these two principles, therefore, 1st, that the means of rewarding public services should still be reserved, and 2dly, that these means should be at the disposal of the Crown, he ventured to recommend these bills to the consideration of their lordships, in the hope that they would agree with him, that it would be beneficial to adopt the general measure, with such amendments in the details as their lordships might think proper. As to the offices of Auditor and Teller of the Exchequer, they were not sinecures, but important parts of the administration of the Court of Exchequer. He did not know whether, in the original formation of this Court, these offices could or could not have been with propriety omitted; but he knew that no one had ever ventured to bring forward a bill for their abolition, and that they had been acknowledged to be useful through a series of successive Acts of Parliament; but he would freely say, that the very circumstance of their not being sinecures, afforded a reason for not considering them as political offices, and for placing them exactly on the footing of other offices of public account; he meant, that those who held them should be entirely disconnected with politics, and should be obliged to attend to their duties in person.—Several instances, illustrating the propriety of such a change, must occur to their lordships, and one was too recent to have escaped the observation of any of them. He alluded to the case of a noble baron (Lord Grenville) who, after having for several years usefully served the Crown, was rewarded with the office of Auditor of the Exchequer. No man was ever more properly rewarded; and yet what an awkwardness resulted from this very reward, when the same noble baron was afterwards made First Lord of the Treasury, an awkwardness which would not have existed if his services had been rewarded by a pension. The offices of Tellers of the Exchequer had already been regulated by law, as far as their profits went: and one noble lord (Marquis Camden) had acted very handsomely in coming forward, voluntarily, and anticipating the future effect of the law. The great, and in some instances, immense profits accruing to the possessors of these offices, rendered them peculiarly unfit to be the rewards of political services; and that, because they had become, and were liable to be at all times, great sources of political discontent. A kind of objection had been raised, that the holders of these offices would be less independent under the new act, than under the former practice, because they would no longer hold under the Crown, but of the Administration. The contrary was the fact: for these offices had never been given by the Crown, but were in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As to the sinecures bill, it was fit that they should be given up; and on two grounds, first, that the Crown should have the power of rewarding services by direct, instead of indirect, compensation; secondly, because the abolition would do away a great deal of the unreasonable prejudice and discontent existing on this point. The Compensation Bill stood on a better footing than a measure formerly brought forward with similar views; for that plan would have lodged in the Crown an unlimited power of granting pensions, whereas the present bill would confine that power within reasonable and economical limits. There would always be considerable doubt as to the claims of public men, and therefore that would be the least objectionable scale of remuneration, which should require a certain definite period of service, in addition to the faithful discharge of that service; especially when this plan would be the least burthensome to the country. That this would be the case appeared from this—that the first class of the pensions would not consist of more than seven persons of 3,000*l.* per year each; and the second class, though comprehending more pensioners, would not at the utmost cost more than 43,000*l.*, and on the average, not more than 30,000*l.* The saving to the country thus effected, would be about 100,000*l.* a year; but this was but an incidental advantage compared to the principle of the thing, which was the more excellent, inasmuch as it left the prerogative of the Crown untouched, while it would tend to exalt the character of public men, and would thus be a great benefit both to the Crown and the people. In the course of his own possession of the office which he now held, he had given away but one of these large sinecures, and that was to the son of the late Mr. Perceval, a gift which, he trusted, must have afforded general satisfaction; but it was seldom that a case so generally approved of could arise. For his own part, he could assure their lordships, that he would be the last person to bring such a measure before the House, unless he felt convinced, that it would leave unimpaired the dignity of the Crown, that it would elevate public men in public opinion, and that, in fact, it was doing away with that which, however sanctioned by time and experience, ought to have been done away long ago.

The Earl of Lauderdale rose to oppose the motion made by the noble Secretary of State, and all the measures before the House connected with that motion. When he recollected the discussions and decisions that had taken place in 1812 and 1813, on the same subject as that now under consideration, and in particular that decision which their lordships came to when the noble Secretary of State moved the previous question on a bill for the same object brought from the other House, he could not for a moment doubt what would now be the determination of their lordships on this question. The noble earl, it was true, had laboured to shew that the bills on the table were very different from the measures formerly proposed, but he saw no reason for so considering them. Indeed, the only ground on which their lordships were called to agree to these bills; the only information before them on which they could form an opinion—namely, the Report of the other House of Parliament—set out with declaring, that the subject was by no means new; that the measures proposed were entirely the same as those of 1812 and 1813. He had read the Report carefully through, to see whether it contained any new reasons for the change which their lordships were called upon to make, but had been unable to discover any. The noble earl, however, seemed to have got a new opinion on the subject without shewing any reason for his adopting it. He had stated, that these offices were such as ought not to be applied to the reward of political services; but this was not his opinion on the former discussions, and he should be glad to know how these offices, which the noble earl held to be perfectly fit, as political recompenses in 1812, should have become unfit for that purpose now? The noble earl had alluded, as an illustration of his new doctrine, to what had occurred respecting the office of Auditor of the Exchequer; but that circumstance, the House would recollect, took place so far back as 1807; yet in 1813, when the abolition bill was discussed by their lordships, the noble earl never said a word on the subject of that office. How came he to overlook it then, and to consider it so very important a topic now? But the noble earl did not say that inconvenience had arisen from this office being held by a person who became First Lord of the Treasury; he only supposed that some might occur. The truth however was, that no inconvenience could arise. In 1817 an attempt was made by those who sought popularity, to make a run against the Minister on this subject, but it completely failed. Another reason which the noble lord had assigned for supporting these bills was, that the emoluments of some of the offices had proved much greater than was originally intended. Now this circumstance existed more strongly in 1812, and was equally well known to the noble earl then as now; but at that time he did not think it any reason for agreeing to the abolition bill. The noble earl had spoken of a noble marquis (Camden) who had given up some of the emoluments of his office. He thought, however, that that noble marquis was by no means called upon so to act. The office was given as a reward for the meritorious services of his father, and he was justly entitled to all it produced; but it was curious enough, that the noble Secretary of State should be anxious for doing away such offices in proportion as their income was diminished. In 1812, when the emoluments were great, he was for preserving them. In 1817, when the emoluments were reduced, he thought that they ought to be abolished. At the assemblies in Spafields, and other meetings which had greatly alarmed some of their lordships, the offices of the noble marquis, and of a noble earl on the cross bench (lord Arden), had been made important topics of declamation. Was it that sort of popular clamour which had induced the noble Secretary of State to change his opinion? He had indeed pointed out some trivial differences between the measure of 1812 and the present; but if he had approved the principle of the abolition-bill, might he not have procured alterations of the particulars to which he objected in the Committee? His objections were not sufficient to account for his opposing that measure altogether, since he thought it to support this. Reverting again to the information before their lordships, as to the grounds on which this measure was proposed, he must insist that it was most frivolous and inconclusive. The Committee, it appeared, was appointed to consider of the revenue and expenditure of the country; and, on reading the recommendation given to the Committee, no person would suppose that the proposing a measure of this kind could have been the result of their labours. At a time when it was admitted that the annual deficiency in the revenue amounted to 15,000,000*l.*, it was perfectly ridiculous to talk of the paltry saving which would be produced by the abolition of the offices in question. Their lordships would recollect, that they had already refused to abolish the offices of Chief Justice in Eyre: these offices, however, the Committee of the House of Commons had proposed to abolish, without assigning any new ground whatever. The Report stated, "that the view which the Committee have taken of the two offices of Chief Justices in Eyre, north and south of Trent, is, that they may be abolished without detriment to the public service." He should be glad to know what there was in this to induce the noble Secretary of State to change the opinion which he held in 1812, or for the House to concur with him in his change. If the Report had mentioned an abuse with respect to the appointment to these offices, or any other thing of that sort, something like a ground for a change of opinion would have been laid; but all that the Committee of the other House stated was, that "they have taken a view that these places ought to be abolished." To which their lordships might answer, that in 1812 they also took a view that the same places ought to be continued. But it was curious enough, that this view taken by the Committee was not only a reason for abolishing these two offices, but several others; for, because they had taken a view of the offices of Chief Justices in Eyre, north and south of Trent, they came to the conclusion, that the offices of Clerk of the Pells, the four Tellers of the Exchequer, the Auditor of the Exchequer, the Warden of the Cinque-ports, and the Governor of the Isle of Wight should be abolished. Unless their lordships were supposed to be idiots, they could not be expected to be convinced by such reasoning as this. The noble earl had stated, that such of these offices as required duties to be executed should be regarded as offices connected with the management of the public accounts, and in no way political. In this opinion the noble earl concurred with the Committee, but he seemed to have forgotten, that some of these offices were places of great trust and responsibility, and ought therefore to be held by persons of high station and rank. This was what the noble earl thought in 1812, and he had stated no sufficient reason for supporting the contrary opinion on this occasion. He thought he could convince the noble earl, and the other noble lords near him, that they ought to adhere to the same opinion on this subject which they held in 1812; and his noble friends who wished to support these abolitions, that they ought to oppose them. He supposed that those who supported the present question must do it either upon the supposition that these abolitions would diminish an improper influence of the Crown, or that they would be advantageous in the way of economy. Much had been done in the present reign, in the way of diminishing the influence of the Crown in Parliament, without having produced any beneficial effect to the public. No less than 72 offices had been abolished, and 39 regulated. In early life he had acted conscientiously with Mr. Burke, in the bills which he introduced on this subject; but he had since had reason to think that he then acted on erroneous views. He had on a former occasion shewn, that during the administration of Sir Robert Walpole there were 118 more place-men in the House of Commons than at present, and yet public liberty was more secure at that time than it was now. The taking away these offices was with him a cause of alarm, when he considered the power of the Crown over the administration of an enormous revenue, in creating rs in that House, and in making peace and war. With all these powers undiminished, the influence of the Crown must necessarily be exercised in a manner much more disadvantageous to the public interest than it was during the existence of the numerous offices which had been abolished. These offices were the channels through which the influence of the Crown was formerly exercised. Since their abolition Ministers had sought for agents of another description, and to that was, in a great degree, to be attributed the enormous war expenditures which the country had sustained. Were the monuments of these places to be at all compared with the debt contracted in one year of war? And was it prudent to place men in circumstances in which they must be exposed to such a temptation? In Sir R. Walpole's time, the country had sustained no injury from the House of Commons being crowded with place-men; but let their lordships look at the present situation of this and the other House, and recollect the numerous expensive wars that had been undertaken, and then ask themselves what benefit was likely to arise from the abolition of places? He opposed the measure, because he was convinced that its effect would be to increase the influence of the Crown in its most baneful direction. He was sensible that it was dangerous to increase the influence of the Crown, but there was a salutary influence of which it ought never to be deprived. Much had been said on the necessity of keeping the other House of Parliament free of any influence, and their lordships' House also free, and each House independent of the other. All this was very fine in theory; but if reduced to practice, it would make the British Constitution the worst that ever existed. It was absolutely necessary that the three branches of our Government should have an intimate connexion with, and dependence on, each other. In the best times of the Constitution, the influence of the Crown had been greater than at present. It was remarkable, that the economical reformers, with whom measures of this sort originated, never seemed to think of the evil consequences of the influence possessed by the Crown in the management and collection of an immense reveme: they wished to abridge that influence which was exercised through the medium of rank and property, and increase it in the most pernicious way in which the influence of a Government can exist. He could not but deeply deprecate measures which forced Ministers to go to the middling and lower classes to exercise directly among them that influence which formerly used to be obtained indirectly, through the medium of persons of fortune and distinction. The influence was now applied to persons in the most dependent situations, who looked to it for the means of existence, and who were of course incapable of resisting official temptations. On this subject it was necessary to speak out the truth. Before the alteration in our system was produced by the abolition of places, Ministers never, except on occasions of great importance, found any difficulty in carrying on the public business in the House of Commons. Now, on the contrary, there were always abundance of gentlemen ready for opposition on every question, to the great inconvenience of the Government, and very seldom in any degree to the advantage of the country. The consequence of this practice was, that the men who were responsible for their conduct were constantly obliged to regulate themselves by the proceedings of those who were in no way responsible for what they said or did. For these reasons he was induced to give his opposition to the motion.

The Earl of Harroby could not agree with the inference of the noble earl, that because his noble friend had voted against the abolitions proposed in 1812, he ought to vote against those now under consideration. In the present case the measure had assumed a very different shape: formerly all that was to be done was proposed in one bill; now the measures were brought distinctly forward, and could be considered separately. The nature of the compensation was also different. The noble earl had stated, that the reason why Sir Robert Walpole had no wars was, because the influence of the Crown was in his time great; and that the reason there had been many wars since was, because that influence was diminished. This was a proposition which, in his opinion, required only to be stated to prove its absurdity. His argument went to shew that the influence of the Crown ought to be exercised through other channels than those in which it was at present directed; but he ought to consider, that a complete change of opinion had taken place in the country as to the manner in which that influence ought to operate. Within the last 30 years there had certainly been about 30 offices taken away, but they were either offices in which no business was done, or such as had been greatly overpaid. The real difference therefore was, that while those offices in which no business was done were abolished, those of actual business were increased. It was absurd to say that they should all continue to exist, those without as well as those with duties to be performed. The clamour of the Spafields meetings, or of any assemblage of that description, was not to be regarded; but he believed that the measure now before their lordships had the approbation of all the loyal and well disposed part of the community.

Lord Redesdale saw nothing in this new measure to induce him to alter the opinion which he had formerly expressed on the subject of sinecures; he thought the principle destructive of a part of the Constitution, and that it rendered the King the only person in his realm who was incapable of conferring a personal favour. The principal objection urged in 1812 and 1813 was, that the House was not sufficiently informed upon the question; that objection had prevailed; and what had since been discovered—what new lights had since been procured to lead to any other conclusion? Was the House at all better instructed now, or had any attempt been made to acquire intelligence? With regard to sinecures, his lordship admitted, that the important duties formerly connected with the offices had not of late years been executed, but at any future period the individuals holding those places might be called upon to fulfil them. Some of them had high judicial functions annexed to them; and would the House consent that they should be assigned over, on the sudden, and without investigation, to the department of the woods and forests, which itself had been much misrepresented? Never had a more unjust cry been raised against any thing than against the forest-laws of this country, which were peculiarly favourable to liberty, when rightly understood. The office of Chief-Justice in Eyre fell under the same consideration as other places mentioned with it. One of the principal provisions of the bill was the abolition of the offices of Teller and Auditor of the Exchequer, which had been originally instituted for the control of the Treasury; yet now, by a singular perversion of the system, the deputies (who in future were to discharge all the functions) were to be made subject and subservient to the Lords of the Treasury.—After an examination somewhat in detail of the minuter provisions, his lordship concluded by warning the House not to yield to popular clamour. It was the duty of Parliament to listen to the wishes of the people, calmly and soberly expressed; but it was equally its duty to submit to nothing that bore the appearance of intimidation.

Earl Gravenor admitted, that a debate upon this subject could not be of the liveliest description: the question had been frequently discussed, both on principle and in detail; but at present the House was not prepared to enter minutely into the particulars of the measure. His lordship was rejoiced that the bill now came forward under more favourable auspices; not indeed that any praise was due to Ministers, or to himself, and those who had persevered in calling the attention of Parliament to the subject; the credit belonged to the nation, who, with one voice, claimed that sinecures should be abolished. The House was not indebted for the measure to popular clamour, which one noble lord had censured, but to the good sense of the country, expressed in every petition laid upon the table for a redress of grievances. The noble lord who spoke last had talked of his resistance to the bills of 1812 and 1813; but he seemed not to recollect that then he had only opposed them in principle; now he had gone into the detail: but he did not appear to be more happy in the one than in the other. He (Lord Grosvenor) objected principally to the clause of compensation, which he saw in the bill before the House. The pension list at present amounted to 230,000*l.* and he did not see any reason for casting new burdens upon the people. One noble earl had argued that this measure rather increased than diminished the influence of the Crown: but, at least, it diminished, on the whole, the weight which the nation had to sustain. The influence of the Crown had, indeed, of late years, most lamentably spread into all the employments of life—it came home to the business and bosoms of all men, no place was free from its visitation, and that chiefly from the immense enlargement of the revenue:—it

Lives thro' all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent.

Yet even allowing that the bill upon the table augmented the influence for the present, that influence could only be of short duration; it would not be hereditary, as was now not unfrequently the case. It was singular, after the opposition which the bills he had introduced had met with from the other side of the House, that the present bill should originate with the Treasury bench; that some noble lords there sitting should stand forward to support it; and he hoped, in this age of constructive and fine-drawn treasons, he should not be supposed to be committing a crime of a very heinous nature, if he ventured to oppose one part of it.

The Lord Chancellor said, that if the noble earl who had just taken his seat supposed that the present bill was at all like that of 1812 and 1813, he was most egregiously mistaken: there was not the slightest similarity. He had preserved the bill of 1812 and 1813, as one of the greatest legislative curiosities ever exposed in a House of Parliament; and he would venture to assert, that, in the course of 50 centuries, so much absolute nonsense would not be brought forward. If the noble earl would say that he understood it, or would produce any man in the kingdom who would say that he understood it, he (the Lord C.) would vote in its favour, if the noble lord proposed it again to-morrow. Such a parade of miserable jargon never before defaced parliamentary parchment. Some noble lords had referred to the authorities of Sir M. Hale and Lord Coke; but he wished the noble lord who spoke last to consider what those two great men would have said upon certain grants of land and valuable leases, whether they were not in reality the greatest sinecures in the country. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Erskine rose, and warned their lordships against the augmenting power and weight in the balance of the Constitution which the other House of Parliament was acquiring, and which was exemplified by the fact, that it had the power of removing any Minister the Crown thought fit to appoint. Above all, their lordships ought to take care that it did not improperly yield, because the other House, session after session, besieged it with the same bills, or at least with bills having the same principle. It was necessary first to inquire who made the demand that sinecures should be abolished, and next, what was the precise nature and object of that demand? If both these were examined, it would be found, that there was no pretence for the measure now submitted. There was a wide difference between complying with the wishes of the people in reasonable matters, and suddenly consenting to such an alteration of the fixed Constitution, as deprived the King of a power which he had hitherto at all times possessed.—His lordship then called the attention of the House to the distinction between mere pensions, and offices of high dignity for the reward of distinguished services; and compared the latter to architectural ornaments, which, while they increased the beauty, added to the strength and solidity of the edifice. He argued that, if sinecures were abolished, the people would not in fact be gainers, as the fees of the offices would not be diminished. Considering the power which the House of Commons possessed, it was necessary that the Crown should possess a certain degree of influence and weight among the leading individuals of the realm.

Lord Arden was sorry he could not concur in the principle of the bill. He considered sinecures as a means vested in the Crown for repairing the misfortunes of noble families, torn and destroyed by the injuries of time. The present bill went entirely to deprive the Crown of those means, and to substitute nothing for them. He had no doubt his noble friends were actuated by honourable motives; but in this instance the interest of Ministers was in direct opposition to that of the Crown. Viewing the bill as operating a great change in the condition of the Crown, he could not conceive how the House could accede to such a measure, and he thought that they had not shewn the Throne due respect in countenancing it so far.

Earl Bathurst, in reply to the objection that this bill went to take offices out of the gift of the Crown, observed, that it was unconstitutional to suppose that the Crown would dispose of any office without an accompanying responsibility; but the offices of Auditor of the Exchequer and Clerk of the Pells were not in the gift of the Crown, but in that of the Treasury. As to the objection that pensions, being a matter of right, would call for no gratitude from the objects of such bounty, this might have been so under the former bill; but, at present the number of pensions being limited, the Crown would exercise a selection, and the objects of such selection must always be beholden for the preference.

Lord Lauderdale was proceeding to explain, when Lord Harrowby rose to order, as the noble lord was transgressing the bounds of explanation.

The House then divided on the question, whether the bill should be committed, when the numbers were—

Content . . . 27

Not-content . . 7

Majority . . 20

The bill then passed through the Committee, and some amendments having been agreed to, the Report was brought up.

The Exchequer Offices bill was committed and the Report brought up; as were the bills for the Abolition of the Offices of Chief Justice in Eyre, north and south of Trent, and Warden of the Cinque Ports; and a bill for the Abolition and Regulation of certain Offices in Ireland and Scotland.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.]

A Message from the Lords announced, that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Commons to this bill.

Another Message required the Commons to attend the Lords Commissioners. The House went: and being returned, Mr. Speaker reported the Royal assent to this bill, and several other public and private bills.

The Election Laws Amendment bill was read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

USURY LAWS.] Mr. Serjeant Onslow moved the order of the day for further considering the Report of the Usury Laws Repeal bill.

Mr. Calcraft observed, that as this bill went to alter the nature of money transactions in this country, it deserved the most serious consideration, which, at present, the House could not bestow upon it.

Sir H. Parnell said, that the popular opinion on this subject resulted from what had been established many years ago. He highly approved of the measure, and hoped the learned serjeant would persevere in urging it.

General Michell thought it was highly expedient to prevent usury, and to keep young men from being robbed. He was against any thing that would legalize fraud, rapine, and extortion, and should therefore move, that the Report be taken into farther consideration upon this day three months.

Irish Grand Jury Presentment Bill. [1718]

Lord Castlereagh said, he thought the question too large to be discussed at the present advanced period of the session. The reasons in favour of the bill were certainly very strong.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow observed, that he was not insensible to the state of the session. He had heard nothing to shake his opinions on the measure, but he had no objection to postpone the consideration of it.

Mr. Baring said, the debate on this question had not been much attended to; but it was a question of great importance. Some alteration in the Usury Laws was indispensably necessary. During the war, when Government were borrowing at more than 5 per cent. interest, no landed proprietor could get money at less than 10 or 12 per cent. interest. The commercial classes of society, from their habits, could easily evade the Usury Laws. He had known many instances of this. He wished to check usury on money raised on expectancies and reversions, and thought that prospective contracts should be considered.

The consideration of the Report was put off for three months.

DROITS OF ADMIRALTY.] Mr. Abercromby, in behalf of Sir J. Mackintosh, whose motion on this subject stood for to-morrow, stated, that his hon. friend was anxious to make way for the discussion on the finances, and therefore wished his motion to stand over for an early day in the next session.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENT BILL.]

Mr. V. Fitzgerald moved that the Report of this bill be taken into further consideration.

Sir F. Flood, who, on a former occasion, said a few words, the import of which was understood to be in favour of the bill, now rose and opposed it. It implied that the conduct of grand juries had been improper, which he would never admit. It was an enactment against prudence, economy, and every principle which both sides of the House had so warmly promoted during the session. It created 36 officers, who were to be appointed by the Government, and the people of Ireland, who were in a state of starvation, were taxed with 15,000*l.* to pay them. Those officers were called surveyors of the county. They were to survey the county, to send what presentments they pleased to grand juries, and to say what the grand juries should pass and what they should not. Five magistrates were to dictate to a grand jury! What an insult was this to the gentlemen of the county who represented the property of the county! It was to take away from them the power which they had exercised since the 36th of the King, and to give it to 36 new men, in new offices unknown to that country. This extravagant, this insulting measure, he would oppose with all his power.

Mr. Abercromby supported the bill, because he conceived it to be singularly calculated to promote the domestic prosperity and welfare of Ireland. It was in the first place a remedy to the abuse of oaths. He read from the evidence given by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. V. Fitzgerald) before the Committee, a statement, shewing that perjuries as to roads and presentments were so frequent and familiar, that they were not regarded as so criminal as other perjuries. In the second place, this measure would operate against the spirit of jobbing, which at present prevailed in grand juries, and which was very hurtful to the interests of the country. The other great advantages of the bill respected the manner of conducting business by grand juries. At present it was utterly impossible for grand juries to get through their business. He again read from the evidence of the right hon. gentleman a conversation he had had with the present Solicitor-General for Ireland, than whom there was no man of a higher character, or more respected for talents and integrity. It appeared, that in the county of Tipperary the grand jury were obliged to sit 13 hours every day; and although no criminal indictment, and no cases connected with the judicial administration, were considered by them, they could bestow only two minutes upon each presentment. The bill went to correct this evil, by establishing a previous investigation at Quarter Sessions by persons whose knowledge, experience, and local information, qualified them to investigate fully the necessity of any measure proposed, and the most economical mode of carrying it into effect. A great collateral advantage would be, that the character, and weight, and authority of Quarter Sessions would be raised. It was well known that the Quarter Session was generally held by a person called the barrister-assistant. He again referred to the evidence of the right hon. gentleman, to shew the impossibility of traversing any bill by the present system. No opportunity of traversing was given till one or two in the morning; and then there was such a multitude of bills passing through the hands of the judge, that it was impossible to know whether the one to be traversed was passed or not. He would appeal to the House whether it was fitting that the people should be taxed to support such a system. The hon. baronet had objected to the expense. The whole principle of the bill was a principle of economy. It provided that no money be raised without ascertaining the necessity of the object, the suitableness of the proposed measure, and the most economical mode of effecting it. The hon. baronet had also objected to the 36 surveyors. This might be inconvenient, but he thought it the best means of ensuring the purpose of the bill. The question was, whether the magistrates could perform the whole business without the surveyors. He should be happy to hear the opinions of gentlemen acquainted with the state of Ireland on that point, when they went into a Committee: but he thought surveyors infinitely preferable to the conservators.

Sir G. Hill strongly objected to the partial nature of the evidence on which it was thought proper to pass this measure for the whole kingdom of Ireland. Evidence had only been examined with regard to sixteen of the counties of Ireland, none at all respecting the other sixteen. In eleven of the sixteen with regard to which inquiry had taken place, no abuses were found in the former system of grand jury presentments; in the other five, it could not be denied that abuses were found; but the whole system ought not to be changed on such limited causes of complaint, nor ought the rest of Ireland to be condemned unheard. He objected to the clauses of the bill which admitted the clergy and the nobility to decide on county works, and to be members of the grand jury in making such presentments. He wished the bill to be printed, and sent to Ireland, to be considered, and to obtain the opinion of the country on its provisions before it passed. With this view, he proposed an amendment, that the said Report be taken into further consideration on this day three months.

Mr. Peel said, he could see no reason why the clergy, as magistrates and proprietors, whose property would be affected by grand jury presentments on county works, should be excluded from the grand jury. They were not to occupy a place there as clergy, but in their other capacities; neither could he agree to the propriety of excluding peers who did not sit in the other House of Parliament. It had been held by the twelve judges, that an Irish peer who held a seat in the Commons' House of Parliament was considered as a commoner, and could exercise his functions as such. Whatever might be thought of this decision, peers who were not either House should be allowed to act as members of the grand jury where their property was concerned; and the more especially, as they were excluded from the exercise of other acts of power which peers of Parliament and commoners could exercise. It might be important to state, that the grand juries of Ireland had an uncontrolled power of imposing taxes for county purposes: but although their functions, in this instance, resembled those of that House itself, they were far from being the fair representatives of those over whom they exercised this authority, being elected by the sheriff alone, and differently constituted from any other body in the United Kingdom which had the power of imposing taxes. The bill, however, did not deprive them of this power, but merely established some degree of check over its exercise, by rendering it necessary that presentments should be subject to the examination of the magistracy. It did not provide that they should have a negative upon the decision of the grand juries, but that it should be submitted for their approbation. It was to be recollected, that the magistracy was a permanent and responsible body, whilst the business of a grand jury often terminated on the first day of the assizes. The bill also provided that a civil surveyor should be appointed to every county, an office which he thought must be considered necessary, when it was understood that the whole average annual sum raised in Ireland in this mode, and for county purposes, amounted to 1,000,000*l.* It had been admitted in evidence received by the Committee, that there was not, in general, time at the assizes for getting through the criminal, much less for transacting the civil business of the county.

Mr. Ponsonby thought that such of the clergy as were in the commission ought to be allowed to attend at the examination of the presentments, because the larger the attendance the greater the advantage. The bill introduced by the late excellent Mr. Horner had been attended, as he knew from personal observation, with the most salutary effects in many counties in Ireland. In giving, however, his cordial support to the general principles of this measure, he felt himself bound to object to that part of it which related to the appointment of county surveyors. He considered such officers as likely to grow up into formidable persons, and to become the instruments of political jobbing, after being in the first instance the creatures of favour and patronage. In any case the clause ought not to stand in its present naked form, but should be attended with some precautions against the danger of abuse.

Sir N. Colthurst expressed an opinion that the summer assizes would be preferable to the spring assizes for the trial of the presentments in question; and was disposed, as well as the right hon. gentleman, to object to the appointment of a county surveyor, as he considered the duties of the office would be infinitely too great to be discharged by an individual.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald thought the appointment of this officer was one of the essential principles of the bill. It was founded, as well as every other important provision contained in it, on the Report of the Committee, of whose recommendations he considered himself merely as the organ in the introduction of this measure. He believed it was calculated to be extremely useful, and that the House could not give a more acceptable pledge to the people of Ireland of its vigilance over their welfare, and its disposition to defend and promote their interests.

Sir H. Parnell said, it was highly necessary there should be some public officer, whose duty it should be to take care that the money levied by the Grand Jury was properly and beneficially expended. The measure, whether bad or good, did not originate with the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Cooper) but in another quarter. He agreed with the right hon. gentleman in thinking that it was not likely the appointment would ever degenerate into a political job.—The bill was a most important one with respect to the good it would do in Ireland, and he was quite sure if it did not pass this session, they would have numerous petitions presented next session, complaining of the evils of the present system.

Mr. Daly suggested the propriety of recommitting the bill.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, he had no objection to a recommitment of the bill, upon a fair understanding that it should be only for the purpose of introducing certain amendments, and not for discussing the principle of the measure; because, at this late period of the session, if any obstruction was interposed it might be fatal to the passing of it.

Sir S. Romilly observed, that understanding from many hon. gentlemen who were better able to form a correct opinion upon the subject than he could do, that the measure was likely to be productive of infinite good to Ireland, he should persuade the right hon. gentleman not to yield to any suggestion for delaying its progress. Any alterations which were thought necessary could be proposed upon the third reading.

Mr. Courtenay hoped no advice would be listened to, which might, by possibility, risk the passing of the bill during the present session, but that the right hon. gentleman would press it through the present stage.

After some farther conversation, the Speaker remarked, that as some time had been already lost, it was incumbent on the House to determine what course it would pursue. If the House would give him leave, he would suggest that the recommitment on Wednesday need not delay the third reading of the bill more than one day.

The immediate questions were then withdrawn, and the bill was ordered to be recommitment on Wednesday.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply,

Sir G. Warrender observed, that in rising to propose certain grants for the further naval service of the year, it was his intention to abstain from all details, and to reserve himself for such explanations as the inquiries of any hon. member might render necessary to the due understanding of the estimates. The clear and able Report of the Finance Committee had furnished so distinct a view of all the various branches of our naval expenditure, as to make this the most advisable course he could pursue on the present occasion. He should, therefore, simply move that a sum not exceeding 1,383,311*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.* be granted for defraying the expense of the ordinary establishment of the Navy for seven lunar months, commencing 18th June, 1817.

Sir C. Pole complained of the parsimonious provision made for the widows of naval officers who had fallen in action; and compared them with the pensions and allowances granted to the families of persons employed in the civil service of the navy.

Sir G. Warrender assured the hon. baronet that the civil pension list was about to undergo the revision of Government, in conformity with the recommendations of the Finance Committee. With respect to the rate of other allowances, they were in many cases undoubtedly small; but they bore the same relation to the rank of the parties as the allowances of the army, and were, in fact, as large as the present circumstances of the country would permit. Whenever the time should arrive for the reconsideration of the subject by Parliament, it would certainly be expedient that both services should be reviewed together.

Mr. Calcraft, after complaining that the flag officers of the navy were not in all respects on the same footing as officers of a corresponding rank in the army, observed that his late colleague (Sir T. Thompson), whose pensions on retiring had been formerly discussed in that House, had, at a period several months subsequent to the explanation then made on the subject, received another pension of 600*l.* a year. His own belief was, that this was granted in repayment of the expenses incurred by the gallant officer in the Rochester election. (Hear, hear.) He certainly had been allowed to retire with a very large provision, his different pensions and offices not amounting to less than 3,000*l.* a year, a sum as large as that received by Lord St. Vincent or any other admiral.

Sir G. Warrander observed, that the hon. baronet's former pensions on account of his professional services, and the wounds he had received, could scarcely be intended to be called in question. He had filled the laborious office of Comptroller of the Navy for 12 years, and had entitied himself to the pension enjoyed by his predecessor, of 1,500*l.* a year. With a view of saving 900*l.* a year to the public, the First Lord of the Admiralty had sacrificed a piece of patronage, and appointed Sir T. Thompson to the Treasurership of Greenwich Hospital, to which a salary of 900*l.* was annexed, and the pension of 600*l.* was given to make up the sum of 1,500*l.*

Mr. Calcraft asked, why then had the appointment to the treasurership taken place in June, and the pension not been granted until September?

Sir G. Warrander assured the hon. gentleman that the whole arrangement was in contemplation from the commencement, and that the delay in assembling of a council, an order from which was necessary, had been the cause of the postponement of the grant of the pension.

Sir G. Hope and Mr. Gruber confirmed the statement of the hon. baronet.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Sir G. Warrander moved that the sum of 600,000*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* be granted for defraying the extraordinary expenses of the navy for seven lunar months.

Sir J. Bland, in answer to a question put to him, said, it had become absolutely necessary to carry on the breakwater at Plymouth more slowly, the spot of the work having been destroyed by the sea, and it being evident that a greater degree of consolidation was necessary to make it answer its purposes. He thought, therefore, that a part of the funds originally appropriated to this undertaking had been prudently withdrawn, and might hereafter, in a more prosperous state of the revenue, be reapplied to its completion.—The resolution was agreed to.

The next resolution was, that the sum of 300,000*l.* be granted, "for the purchase of provisions for troops and garrisons on foreign stations and the value of rations for troops to be embarked on board ships of war and transports, for 1817."

Mr. Rose said, he wished to take the opportunity afforded to him by this Committee, of referring to a petition lately presented by an hon. and learned member, (see page 1635.) from a seaman named Dennis Sullivan, and which stated positively that the petitioner had applied to him in vain for the recovery of some prize-money: he could assure the Committee that there was not the slightest truth in this statement. The petitioner had applied to him in November 1814, for the recovery of prize-money to the amount of 5*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*, and he had immediately written to the agent, who remitted the money. Dennis Sullivan then complained to him a second time, that deductions to the amount of 7*s.* 6*d.* had been made from the sum due to him. He was far from thinking this charge too insignificant for notice; he had closely investigated the particulars, and found that it was a perfectly reasonable charge, being made up of 2*s.* 6*d.* commission, 1*s.* stamp, 1*s.* 6*d.* for the order, and 1*s.* 9*d.* for postage. Mr. Sullivan indeed declared that he did not mind the money, but that his object was to protect his brother seamen, and to get the agent overhauled. (A laugh.) Now he could assure the Committee that those persons were already pretty well overhauled: he had two in gaol, several had fled, and proceedings were going on against their sureties. He had since received for the same individual two other sums of 1*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, and 3*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, for which he had given receipts, and for which he had expressed himself satisfied. No complaint of ill treatment by a seaman was left unexamined; but the truth was, that they were hardly more remarkable for their spirit and perseverance than for a carelessness of their own affairs, and were thus frequently disposed to make unfounded complaints through ignorance of their real situation. Three gentlemen alluded to by name were remarkable for their civility and attention. No human being could have applied to any of them that was not treated with civility. If any thing further should be said in the discussion of the subject, he would produce the correspondence that took place.

Sir G. Warrander said, that a person representing himself to have been severely wounded had applied to Mr. Dyer, (one of the three gentlemen above alluded to), but it turned out that he had been only one year in the service, and that the wound occasioned him no material injury; he had been only seven days unfit for duty. He had, therefore, obtained no pension. He had met with no indignity; but one O'Hara, who called along with him, first on Mr. Dyer, and afterwards on himself, had behaved himself so improperly that they were obliged to order him out.

Mr. C. Wynn, Sir C. Pole, and Mr. D. Gilbert bore testimony to the attention, humanity, and zeal, of the right hon. gentleman to do justice to all who applied to him.—The Resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Arbuthnot then moved, that 7,614*l.* be granted, "to complete the original estimated Expense of the Works at Holyhead Harbour for the present year."—Also 450*l.* "to defray the Expense of making a Landing-place at Port Devargh, on the Hill of Holyhead, for the Landing of the Mails from the Packets by Boats, when the wind does not enable them to reach the Harbour in time to land the Mail by the Coach, for the present year."—Also 8,951*l.* or 6*d.* "to defray the supplemental Charge for Miscellaneous Printing done by order of the House of Commons in the Session of 1816."—Also 40,000*l.* "to defray the extraordinary Expenses of the Mint in the Gold Coinage for the year 1817."

Mr. Bankes asked whether the coinage was all finished, as the charge was thus precisely stated?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the estimate was formed upon the principle, that the charges for each month should be the same. The amount was four millions some odds, and the time proposed nine months.

Mr. Ponsonby asked whether Ministers intended to introduce the new coinage into Ireland?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that next Session steps would be taken for reforming the coin in Ireland, and for assimilating it to the coin of this country. Government meant afterwards to reform the currency as well as the specie in Ireland.

Mr. Ponsonby hoped that the greater measure would be in their view as much as the less.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the one would be a step towards the other; but for obvious reasons he could not be more explicit at present.

These several Resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. Arbuthnot then moved, that the sum of 20,000*l.* be granted, "to defray the Expense of improving sundry portions of the Holyhead Roads."—Also 600*l.* "for paying off and discharging on the 10th day of October, 1817, certain Annuities granted by two Acts of the 27th and 42d years of his present Majesty."—Also 28,000*l.* "for defraying the Expense of maintaining and repairing the British Forts on the coast of Africa for the year 1817."

Mr. Gordon observed, that those forts had been originally intended for the protection of the slave trade; that on the abolition of that trade they were applied to the protection of general commerce, which purpose they in some measure effected; but there was an inconvenience in the present system of government. The governors were themselves traders. He wished that Ministers would appoint the governors, leaving to the company to appoint inferior officers; or if the Government would appoint the whole, it might be as well. That country could be improved only by commerce, the parent of civilization. Schoolmasters should be sent thither; and communications ought to be opened with the Ashantee country. These remarks he ventured to make, although the Committee on the subject, of which he was a member, had not yet made their Report. He would mention too, as a commercial consideration, that the Committee recommended that the duty on palm oil should be reduced, and the duty on ivory altered. At present, as the duty on large and small teeth was the same, only large teeth were imported. A duty ad valorem would be an improvement.

Mr. Arbuthnot explained why the estimate was proposed before the Report of the Committee was given in.

Mr. Marryat said, the company were most intelligent and judicious men, and conducted their affairs in an economical and men-of-business like manner. Their secretary was eminently qualified for such a situation.

Mr. Gordon hoped, if the company should be abolished, that the secretary would have an appointment in the new arrangement.

The Resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. Arbuthnot next moved, that the sum of 3,000*l.* be granted, "for the Board of Agriculture for the year 1817."—Also 207,832*l.* 7*s.* "for defraying the Charge of the Disembodied Militia of Great Britain for the year 1817."—Also 124,522*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* sterling, being 134,899*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* Irish currency, "for defraying the Charge of the Disembodied Militia of Ireland for the year 1817."

The House then resumed, and the Report was ordered to be brought up to-morrow.

On the motion of Mr. Arbuthnot, the Committee on the Lyme Regis Harbour was revived, and several new names were added.

Mr. Croker obtained leave to bring in a bill to ascertain the right of Greenwich Hospital to prize-money and droits of Admiralty. The bill was necessary on account of the expression "during hostilities" in the act on the subject which had been introduced by Lord Grey.

IRELAND ELECTION LAWS BILL.] This Bill was read a third time. On the motion that it pass, Mr. Dominic Browne brought up two clauses, which were added as riders.

Sir G. Hill proposed a clause, which Mr. Ponsonby opposed, as unfavourable to the impartiality due to candidates at elections.—The right hon. gentleman said, it was highly desirable that there should be a fair registry.

Mr. C. Wynn was aware of the statute-law on the subject in Ireland; but he was bound also to consider the old statute-law, which prevented a sheriff from keeping the poll open beyond the appointed time.

After a few words from Mr. D. Browne, Mr. Craker observed, that the bill must be subservient to the general law, as to the return.

The question was called for, but no division took place, and further proceedings upon it were adjourned till to-morrow.

MARRIAGES SOLEMNIZATION BILL.] This Bill was read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

[The House was about to proceed with other business, when the question of adjournment was put and carried, and strangers were excluded from the gallery, and the lobbies and passages, in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Mr. Ponsonby, who was stricken with a paralytic affection, which deprived him of the powers of speech and motion. His situation was, for some minutes, unperceived by the House. Mr. Arbushnot first discovered it, and immediately moved the adjournment. Mr. Ponsonby was conducted to the room of the Speaker's Secretary, and medical assistance was procured. He was there let blood, and, after this relief, regained the faculty of utterance. At half past twelve o'clock the right hon. gentleman, accompanied by Earl Grey, who had been sent for, was removed in the Speaker's chair to his house in Curzon-street*.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, July 1.

The Irish Insurrection Bill, and Irish Sheriffs Bill, were read a third time and passed.

DIVORCES.] The Earl of Lauderdale stated, that it was not his intention to propose to their lordships any farther proceedings on Millar's Divorce Bill. The ground on which he abandoned the bill was, the doubt which was entertained whether such a bill could be passed consistently with the general principles which governed their lordships' proceedings in such cases. He was anxious to have it understood, that this was the only ground for his giving up the bill. As to Mr. Millar, a near relation of his, under whose government Mr. Millar had lived, had given him the highest character in every respect. There was no imputation whatever on

On Tuesday, the 9th of July, Mr. Ponsonby expired. He was the second son of the Right Hon. John Ponsonby, Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, and consequently brother to William, the first Lord Ponsonby. He was born on the 15th of March, 1753, and in 1780 was called to the bar. In 1782, he was presented with a silk gown, and made first Counsel to the Commissioners of the Revenue. He was then brought into the Irish Parliament. In 1806 he was appointed Lord Chancellor of Ireland, which situation he retained until his political friends ceased, in 1807, to be in the reins of Government, and he had ever since been what is termed the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons.—For his character as a Statesman, see the proceedings of the House on the 11th July.

the conduct of Mr. Millar; but it was dangerous, under all the circumstances of this case, to pass such a bill; and therefore he moved, that it be committed this day three months, which was ordered accordingly.

TITHES LEASING BILL.] The Duke of Gloucester presented a petition of the Vice-Chancellor and Scholars of the University of Cambridge against this bill. The petitioners could not view this interference with Church property without alarm, and they prayed that the bill might not pass into a law.

The petition was read and laid on the table.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS BILL.] This bill was committed and reported, without amendment.

ABOLITION BILLS.] On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, the Abolition Bills were reported, with one amendment in the English and Irish Exchequer Offices Bill, and were ordered to be read a third time on Thursday next.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] The Archbishop of Canterbury rose to move the second reading of this bill. He observed, that, in its principle, and for the most part in its details, it was the same as the bill which had come before their lordships last Session, and which they had ordered to be printed and circulated. Its object was, to consolidate into one act all the laws which lay scattered in the statute book relative to spiritual persons holding farms, to the residence of beneficed clergymen on their livings, and the allowances to be made to stipendiary curates. The clergy would thus have the means of knowing the laws particularly affecting them.

The bill was read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SHERIFFS.] The Earl of Donoughmore, adhering to the notice which he had given of his intention this day to bring the subject of the appointment of the High Sheriff of Tipperary under the notice of their lordships, stated, that upon consideration he had thought it the better course to embody what he had to say in the shape of a resolution, relative to the appointment of Irish Sheriffs generally. He should not therefore trouble the House with an introductory speech.

The noble earl accordingly read the resolution, which stated, in substance, that—It appearing by the reported debates in Parliament, that the responsible Ministers of the Crown had, in the course of last Session, both in that and the other House of Parliament, represented it to be the intention of his Majesty's Government to forego the patronage depending on the appointment of sheriffs in Ireland, and to render the appointment of sheriffs a subject of judicial proceeding, the fitness of the person to be appointed being the chief consideration, according to the practice in England:

And it appearing, that no act had been since done to place the appointment of sheriffs in Ireland on the same footing as the appointment of those officers in England, except that an intimation had been given by the Irish Under Secretary of State to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, that it was the wish of Government, that the appointment of sheriffs should be conducted according to the ancient practice, which established the principle that, in making such appointments, the public interests, and not the private interests of individuals, were to be consulted :

And it appearing, that the justly reprobated modern practice still prevailed, as had been exemplified in the case of the sheriff of Tipperary, who had excluded from the grand jury six most respectable gentlemen, and put six others in their place, for no reason that appeared except that the six gentlemen so excluded might be less favourably disposed towards the interests of the governing party :

And it appearing, that grand juries in Ireland were in the habit of making assessments to a very large amount on land, for the repairing of roads and bridges, and other purposes ; and that Ireland having, by the thoughtless profusion of those who had the management of finances, become unable to pay its quota of the interest of the general expenses of the nation ; and that, as Great Britain was obliged to pay the difference, it followed that the people of this country were directly interested in preventing an undue deduction by grand juries from the general fund for the expenditure of the United Kingdom :

And it appearing, that in this country the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended, and that in Ireland persons might be transported for seven years without any trial by jury ; and that, therefore, it was of the greater consequence that the laws which remained should be executed in the manner most beneficial for the public ; and as the office of sheriff was the centre round which the administration of justice revolved ; and as it was, therefore, of the 1st importance, that this office should be properly filled, in order to prevent the stream of justice from being poisoned at its source, and from being as little as possible corrupted by private interests or Court intrigue :—that for all these reasons, the House would earnestly supplicate the Prince Regent, to give such directions as might be necessary for having the sheriffs in Ireland appointed by solemn decision of the judges called together for that purpose by the Lord Chancellor, they being as much responsible for such appointments as for any other judicial act.—The facts as to the sheriff of Tipperary, his lordship was ready to prove at the bar.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the noble earl's motion seemed to embrace the whole business of the Session, and could not be adopted even if a resolution had been required. But with respect to the question of the appointment of sheriffs, the state of the case was this :—According to the late practice, the appointments had been made by the Lord-lieutenant, and this had been considered as an important part of the Government patronage: but as that, might interfere with the due administration of justice, or as it might possibly create an impression in the public mind that it did so interfere, he had declared, and a noble friend of his had declared in another place, that it was their desire to give up this patronage, and to place the appointment of sheriffs in Ireland on the same footing as the appointment of sheriffs in England. Instructions had been accordingly given, but, in entering upon a new practice, it was not surprising if some of the judges had a little mistaken the proper mode of proceeding. In England, the judges on the circuit took every precaution to ascertain who were the persons in the counties best calculated for the execution of the office of sheriff. They might consult the existing sheriff, but did not depend on his information exclusively, because if they did, the sheriff would in effect have the nomination of his successor. If, therefore, the Irish judges contented themselves with the information of the existing sheriff, it was a misapprehension of the rule. With respect to the sheriff of Tipperary, a roll of three persons had been given in. The first on the roll was, according to the usual practice, appointed by the Lord-lieutenant: he made an excuse; and then the second was appointed: he also made an excuse; and the third was appointed, who also made an excuse; and then the first on the roll was, according to the regular course, called upon to execute the office. There could have been no misconduct, therefore, on the part of the Government. It was the wish and intention of Government to place the appointment of sheriffs in Ireland on the same footing as the appointments to that office in England.

The Earl of Donoughmore disclaimed all intention to throw any imputation on the Government or the judges. He even cast no imputation on the sheriff of Tipperary, except that he had not made such a good selection of grand jurymen as he might and ought to have done. In other respects he believed he was a worthy man and a good magistrate.—The noble earl also stated, that with reference to this subject of the appointment of sheriffs, some regulation ought to be made as to the judges going upon circuits, where they might have opportunities of promoting their own private and local interests. The resolution was then put, and negatived without a division.

[SAVINGS BANKS.] In a Committee on the Savings Banks Bill, Lord Redesdale proposed a variety of amendments. A conversation afterwards arose on the difficulties to which the execution of the bill, in its present imperfect state, would be exposed; and the Lord Chancellor suggested, that the better way would be to move the postponement of the present bill for three months, in order to give an opportunity for introducing a new one. The Report was accordingly ordered to be received this day three months.

The order of the day for committing the Irish

Savings Banks Bill was also postponed to this day three months.

of Unfunded Debt unprovided, exclusive of any excess of charge upon the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, beyond the income thereof) of 14,729,700

Being less by the sum of 1,394,743; than the sum of 16,124,443, which, as before stated, will be applied in the course of the year to the reduction of Funded and Unfunded Debt, viz.

Sum to be applied to the reduction of Debt 16,124,443

Increase of Unfunded Debt, 14,729,700

The first resolution being read, the debate was adjourned till Friday.

COTTAGE WINDOW TAX (SCOTLAND) BILL.] The order of leave to bring in a bill on this subject, (see page 1379) was read and discharged, and another bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Lushington and Lord A. Hamilton. Accordingly a bill was brought in, and read a first time, "for extending the exemptions from the duties granted by certain Acts of the 43d and 45th years of his present Majesty's reign, on Dwelling-houses in Scotland, and for altering the manner of claiming and ascertaining the exemptions to be granted."

FRIVOLOUS ALIBERTS BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

FRAME BREAKING PREVENTION BILL.] The Attorney-General moved for leave to bring in a bill "to repeal an Act passed in the 54th year of his present Majesty, for the punishment of persons destroying stocking or lace frames, and articles in such frames, and to make other provisions in lieu thereof."

Mr. Abercromby supported the motion. The Luddites were formidable from their objects and their numbers; but quite contemptible as to any effort they could make to overturn the Constitution. The offences, however, were so great as to require severe punishment. He would not vote for the bill as a means merely of terror; but he hoped that in cases of conviction it would be rigidly enforced. Terror was too narrow a principle to be proceeded upon.

The bill was brought in and read a first time.

REFORM.] Sir E. Bouverie presented a petition of inhabitants of St. Luke, Chelsea, praying for Economy, and a Reform of Parliament. Ordered to lie on the table.

PERSONS CONFINED FOR TREASON.] Mr. Benner asked the hon. gentleman, whom he saw in his place, whether he was now prepared to give any answer as to the petition he had presented from Mr. Evans.

Mr. H. Addington, as it seemed to be the wish of the House, particularly of gentlemen on the side, to hear an explanation of the petition, in Mr. Evans's petition, acknowledged that he was now prepared to give a much more satisfactory answer than he could have given on that the petition was presented. It had been then argued, that all in the petition must be true; and even an hon. gentleman (Mr. Barham) had gone so far as to say, that he would submit a motion on the subject, if a satisfactory explanation should not be given. He might consider himself absolved by the notice of such a motion from giving any explanation till the motion was made; but he was now willing to explain all the complaints in the petition. First, as to the petition said to have been withheld; he had felt confident that his noble relation, the Secretary of State, was not capable of so great an abuse as deliberately keeping a petition from any subject from reaching the walls of that House. Mr. Evans sent a petition on the 21st of February to the Secretary of State's Office, by the hands of Mr. Abbot, for a noble lord, whom he did not now see in his place (Lord Cochrane): but, on the next morning, he sent to request that it should be given to Mr. Harmer, his solicitor. Mr. Harmer received it accordingly, and since then nothing had been heard of it in the office; but, last Saturday, on looking over the papers in the Vote-office, he found that it had been presented to that House on the 27th of Feb. (see p. 376.) and by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bennet). He would say nothing disrespectful of the hon. gentleman; but he must pardon him for expressing considerable surprise that he had sat in his seat at the time this charge had been so strongly urged without once contradicting it.—He would now proceed to the other charges. Mr. Abbot (for he had examined him on the subject—he had first gone to the gaoler of Coldbath-fields, and then to the gaoler of Horse-monger-lane) assured him that he had never refused Mr. Evans the use of pen, ink, and paper. It was always the practice in that gaol to cast prisoners into irons. Mr. Abbot had been there five years, and it had been the practice before his time. The day after Mr. Evans had been thrown into irons, three gentlemen, the present sheriff, the late sheriff, and a Mr. Harris, asked to see him; and one of them asked the gaoler, whether it was the practice to put prisoners there into irons? Being told that it was the uniform practice, they acquiesced. The next day, the irons were taken off.—He then read a description of the room in which Mr. Evans was confined, which had been called the condemned dungeon. It was 23 feet long, 18 feet wide, and 11 feet high. There were two large windows, a fire-place, and a coal-place. There was a fine view of the Surrey hills from his window. (Great laughter.) The younger Evans had a room exactly the same, except that, being lower, the view from it was not so extensive. It had been alleged, that they had not been allowed to walk any where. There was an arcade 55 feet in length, in which they were allowed to walk. He asked the gaoler whether there was not a place where they could conveniently enjoy free air, and he answered, "Certainly not, without being exposed too much to their security."—Another point he would mention was Mr. Evans's want of communication with his dearest friends. His wife had been allowed to visit him and to converse with him through the iron gate, which was open from top to bottom, so as to admit them to see and converse freely. All the possible modes in which any grievances felt by the prisoners could be made known were two. The one was by writing to the Secretary of State. This, Mr. Watson had done, and always obtained redress, for which he had written a letter of thanks. The other mode was by sending to inquire at the gaols, which it was impossible to do as to every gaol in the country; and which, if possible, would be a libel upon the individuals who were most carefully chosen to watch over the treatment of prisoners and the management of prisons.

Mr. Bennet admitted that he had presented a petition formerly from Mr. Evans, but he had not known on Friday last, and did not know now, that it was the identical petition with respect to which there was a complaint of its not having been forwarded. As to the other points, he must say that the right hon. gentleman had advocated, but had neither denied nor explained them. Mr. Evans was put, first into Coldbath-fields prison, into the same room and into the same bed with a felon. The younger Evans was put into the hospital-room, with six unhealthy felons. He went to visit Evans on Monday last, but was not permitted to see him; he then requested to be allowed, at least, to see the arcade, which was granted. In going up the stairs he looked into the dungeons: he did not see Mr. Evans, but he saw Mr. Pilkington, in the same kind of room as Evans's. He asked if it was the same, and was answered it was precisely. There he saw that unhappy man, that innocent individual, pacing the room up and down. (Hear, hear.) It was a place for condemned persons, a place for convicts between the time of sentence and that of execution. It was not a place of confinement, but a place of punishment. With the felon's punishment he had also the felon's fare. There was a trundle bed, a pail for water, a table, and a chair. The right hon. gentleman had not said that Evans had any fire. He would appeal to the common principles of humanity, whether Mr. Evans, who was author of the pamphlet on the Spencean doctrines, should be excluded from all means of literary gratification? However ludicrous those doctrines were, it was evident that he was a literary person. It was, then, no small hardship for such a person to be denied the use of a candle for the long hours that he had to pass in the dungeon. Yet how much harder would it be by and bye, when the long nights as well as long days must be so passed, as the act was now extended to the 1st of March. (Hear, hear.) He wished the honorable gentlemen on the other side had a little experience of the dreadful distress of passing hour after hour without a human being to converse with, and without any means of amusing or consoling their minds, that they might learn the Christian duty of doing to others as they would be done by. If was not denied that Mr. Evans's flute was taken from him. Nine-tenths, then, of the charges were admitted. As the right hon. gentleman could not be contradicted, he was forced to admit that pen, ink, and paper had not been refused: but now as to the arcade. From the pompous manner in which it was mentioned, it might be supposed to be something like the Piazza in Covent-garden. It was in fact a stone passage, three or four feet broad, with a grated window to admit a glimmering of light. It was nothing more nor less than the necessary passage to the cells. The right hon. gentleman had made out nothing like a case for the gaoler, or the sheriffs, or Mr. Harris. Evans was confined, not for a crime, not upon the charge of a crime, but upon suspicion of treason. The only pretence for putting him into irons must have been to keep him in safety, but the prison was more like a fortress than a prison. He did not say that it was absolutely impossible for an adventurous prisoner to attempt to escape, but, as to Mr. Evans, there was not the least chance of his attempting or effecting his escape. Lord Chancellor King had said, when a gaoler applied to be allowed to put a prisoner in irons for security;—"No, the law does not permit a man to be punished before he is condemned—you have no right to put him in irons; make your walls higher if it be necessary to secure him." (Hear.)

Mr. Baring said, that as he had given notice of a conditional motion on the subject, it would naturally be expected that he should say whether or not he was satisfied with the explanation that had been given. He would not now enter into reasons; he would merely say, that he trusted no man in that House could have so far mistaken his character as to expect he should be satisfied with such an explanation. (Hear, hear, hear.) One or two circumstances were differently stated, but there was still abundance of matter for most serious consideration. He would make his motion to-morrow.

Mr. Brougham asked the right hon. gentleman, whether he was to credit the assertion that Mr. Evans was without fire or candle?

Mr. H. Addington could only say that no severity had been exercised towards him but what was usual in all other cases.

Mr. Brougham must then consider the charge as true, and would only therefore say, at present, that he rejoiced exceedingly at his hon. friend's resolution to make his motion.

WATCH-MAKERS.] Mr. P. Moore moved that the petition of the watch-makers be referred to a select committee. The motion was agreed to; and Mr. P. Moore, Mr. Buxton, Mr. The Lord Mayor of London, Sir F. Burdett, and other members were named on the Committee.

COPY-RIGHTS.] On the motion of Sir E. Blyden, a return was ordered from the Universities, and other public bodies, of the Books which having been claimed under the Copyright Act of 54 Geo. 3. are placed in their libraries; and which of the same have been otherwise, and how, disposed of.

COTTON-YARN.] Mr. D. Gillies moved that the order for a committee to inquire into the policy of restricting or prohibiting the exportation of cotton-yarn (see p. 1660), be discharged, on the ground that it was too late in the session to inquire and to report on so extensive a subject. Only one side had been heard, and great inconvenience would result from the labours of a committee which could not institute an inquiry into the relative interests of both parties concerned.

Mr. F. Lewis was glad that an end was now likely to be put to this impolitic and ill-judged attempt to agitate the public mind. We had permitted the exportation of cotton twist. The trade was flourishing, great capital was embarked, and great industry employed in it; and, by any impolitic interference, we might sacrifice an important national manufacture, and create great additional distress for a very uncertain advantage to one class, and, perhaps, for a loss to all.

Mr. Cawthorne consented to the motion, but hoped the House would appoint a Committee early in the next Session. He stated, that a million of weavers in Lancashire and Cheshire were not earning above four shillings and sixpence a week for the support of themselves and their families. They ascribed their distresses to the exportation of cotton-yarn; and represented, that the average quantity left in the country did not furnish employment for more than 200,000 persons.

Mr. Baring was averse to the House pledging itself to the appointment of a Committee early in the next Session; as tending to encourage hopes which it would be impossible to realize. He had never heard that foreigners could not carry on the cotton-manufacture without our yarn; indeed, he knew the contrary to be true. Of 2,700,000*l.* worth of this material that was exported, France, which had very large cotton manufactories, particularly near Rouen, took no more than to the value of 21*l.* The House ought not rashly to adopt a measure, the consequence of which might be to excite a new commercial warfare in Europe.

Mr. Buxton was also anxious to guard against any proceeding which might lead foreign nations to believe that the British Parliament meant to extend that system of exclusion which had been already carried too far.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not deny that there were many principles in our commercial policy which, whether wisely introduced or not, might induce particular classes of manufacturers to apply for protecting regulations: at the same time, as those principles were now considered to be erroneous, the presumption was against the propriety of acceding to such applications, which could be supported by extraordinary circumstances. For example, the woollen trade seemed to be that branch of our manufacturing industry which was most entitled to the especial care of the Government, because the raw material was part of our native produce.

before them, the article imported from abroad, and might be by any other country. The mental system, by Buonaparte, a practical pro-lity of preventing the existence of a rival manufacture, by prohibiting the exportation of this article. Nothing could easily be imagined more mad or vain than this attempt to carry on a cotton manufacture without any importation of the raw commodity. Yet Buonaparte, although at an expense far beyond the value of the undertaking, succeeded in getting cotton from Turkey, brought through India, into his own dominions, and this wed what might be done by the vigour of a government resolutely bent upon any object of this description.

Mr. D. Gilbert said a few words to a similar effect, and the order was then discharged.

USURY LAWS.] Mr. Serjeant Onslow gave notice that, early in the next Session, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for the repeal of the laws that regulate the rate of interest.

IRELAND ELECTION LAWS BILL.] The further proceedings upon the third reading of this bill were resumed, and the bill was passed.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND.)] Mr. F. Fitzgerald brought in a bill "to provide for the establishment of Asylums for the Lunatic Poor in Ireland."—Read a first time.

MARRIAGES SOLEMNIZATION BILL.] After some observations from Sir J. C. Hippisley and Mr. Serjeant Onslow in favour of a general revision of the marriage laws, the House went into a Committee on this bill. The Report was brought up, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on this day three weeks; the bill to be printed. [The preamble of this bill states, that many evils have ensued from clandestine Marriages, the regulations provided by the 26th Geo. II. having been evaded, and due inquiry not having been made into the truth of certain notices required to be given for publishing the banns. The bill therefore enacts:—1st, That no parson, &c. within England and Wales, shall publish banns of matrimony; unless the persons to be married, of one of them, shall, seven days at least before the time required for the first publication of such banns, personally deliver to the clerk, a notice in writing, with the name or mark of each of such persons subscribed, of their true Christian and surnames, of the house or houses of their respective abode, within the parish, chapel, or extra-parochial place, wherein each of the persons to be married shall dwell, specifying the street or place where such house or houses is or are situate, and the number or numbers, if any, and of the time during which they have dwelt, inhabited or lodged in such house or houses respectively.—2dly, That the party delivering the notice shall subscribe a declaration, in the presence of the clerk, that he or she is willing to make oath that the statements contained in such notice are true; to the best of his or her belief and knowledge; and that previous to the solemnization of marriage, the parson, having first read over the said notice to both the said parties, shall call upon them to make oath as aforesaid.—3dly, That the said clerk shall, on or before the Sunday next after the receipt of such notice, deliver a copy thereof to the clergyman; and another copy to one of the churchwardens, overseers, or guardians of the poor, and also enter a copy thereof in a book to be provided and kept for that purpose.—And for preventing and detecting any fraud or falsehood in the notices, it is enacted, that in cases where the churchwarden, &c. shall discover such fraud or falsehood, and shall make the same known to the parson, before the time required for publication of banns shall expire, and such minister shall certify the same under his hand upon the said notice, the churchwarden shall be allowed to charge five shillings, and no more, in his accounts.—And in order to render more effectual the provisions of the 26th Geo. II. for preserving the evidence of marriages, and to make the proof thereof more certain and easy, it is enacted, that the witnesses required by the said act to attest the celebration of marriages, shall be described by their addition and places of abode respectively added to their names, and shall be other than the parish clerk or sexton of the place.—The act to be read in churches at certain times.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, July 2.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Lord Erskine presented a petition from certain persons, praying the abolition of the practice of sweeping chimneys by means of climbing boys. As machinery would answer all the purposes, he trusted that this atrocious practice would be entirely abolished.

The petition was laid on the table.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS BILL.] This bill was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Commons.

Wednesday, July 2.

SAVINGS BANKS.] Committees were appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, with relation to any Proceedings upon the English and Irish Savings Banks Bills.—The Committees went, and being returned, they presented their Reports.—Mr. Rose then moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill “to encourage the establishment of Banks for Savings in England.”

Sir J. Newport moved for and obtained leave to bring in a similar bill for Ireland. Both bills were brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS BILL.] This bill was brought from the Lords, and, on the motion of Mr. Croker, was read a first time.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.] Mr. H. Martin moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill “for regulating the Office of Deputy Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer at Westminster, and for the better securing the monies and effects paid into the said Court on account of the suitors of the said Court, and for the appointment of an Accountant General, and of two Masters of the said Court.”—The bill was brought in, and read a first time.

ALNAGE ABOLITION.] A bill was brought in and read a first time “to abolish the Subsidy and Alnage of the old and new draperies, and of the woollen manufactures in Ireland, and to authorize the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of an annual sum to John Lord de Blaquiere, during the continuance of his interest in the office of Alnager.”

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS REGULATION BILL.] Mr. Bennet stated, that from the advanced period of the Session, he was reluctantly obliged to signify the postponement of the second reading of this bill to this day three months.—The second reading was postponed accordingly.

FRAME-BREAKING PREVENTION BILL.—COTTAGES EXEMPTION (SCOTLAND) BILL.] These bills were read a second time.

UNDUE REMISSION OF PUNISHMENT.] Mr. Bennet called the attention of the House to a case which he had brought before them some time ago. (See page 1076.) It was then objected that they ought only to interfere in cases where a remedy could not be obtained from a court of law. Since that period the parties had had recourse to a court of law, and it appeared that no relief could be obtained. In order to bring the subject under the consideration of Parliament, he should move, that there be laid before the House a “Copy of the proceedings held at the General Quarter Session of the Peace, and General Session of Oyer and Ter-miner for the county of Middlesex, touching the case of the King versus Robert Hov.”—Ordered.

SLAVE TRADE.] Mr. Wilberforce postponed his motion on this subject till Wednesday next.

PERSONS CONVICTED FOR TREASON.] Mr. Barham said, that in bringing forward the motion of which he had given notice in the case of Thomas Evans, it was unnecessary for him to disclaim any feelings of personal hostility to the noble Secretary of the Home Department, from whom, as well as from his right hon. relative (Mr. H. Addington), he had received his full share of civility. Neither did his motion originate in any general hostility to the measures which were proposed from the other side of the House, nor from any bias towards democratical opinions. The whole course of his parliamentary life, if any one had thought fit to observe so humble an individual, would contradict such a supposition. He had often, from conviction, supported measures which had originated from the other side of the House, and from the same principle he now opposed them. He had always been of opinion that democratical or monarchical principles pushed to their extent, would have probably in the end the same effect; that as the democratical principle, by unrestrained ascendancy, might destroy liberty by means of the subversion of the Government, so the ascendancy of arbitrary power, by destroying liberty, would cause the destruction of the Government. He had once thought fit to support the Government, and, by supporting it, to support liberty itself against democratical power; and he now, by supporting liberty against arbitrary principles, conceived he was also contributing to the security and permanence of the Government. That arbitrary notions and practices now prevailed and were increasing, he was persuaded, not only by things said and done every day, which would not formerly have been tolerated, but by the silence observed as to the maxims which had once been the boast of Englishmen, or the manner in which, when advanced, they were received. Not to enumerate many instances, they would recollect that when in a speech which would long be deeply impressed on the minds of all who had heard it, a noble lord (Nugent) had said, that a revolution was to be preferred to slavery, (see p. 1681), this sentiment was received not by a murmur, but a clamour of disapprobation from the opposite side of the House. Was this a new sentiment? Was it not one which had been uttered daily in the best times of English history? He should wish to see one of those who joined in that clamour stand forward and record his name, and explain what would have been his sentiments respecting that which had at other times been called the glorious Revolution, but which these gentlemen must have called a treasonable conspiracy to prevent King James II. from establishing arbitrary power. That gentleman would also have the goodness to explain upon what principle of consistency he could view the present occupant of the throne in any other kind than that of an usurper. As to the case the subject of his motion, two examples had been given by the right hon. gentleman (Addington). The first had been interrupted, the Speaker. He was sorry that it had been interrupted, not that he questioned the discretion of the Speaker, who, in the time he had hitherto filled the Chair, had shewn, that however long he might continue there, it would be to his own honour, and the advantage of the country. The words of the right hon. gentleman were few, but pregnant with meaning. He asked, how he could know what passed within the interior of a prison? Now the Secretary of State ought to know from day to day what passed respecting persons whom he had committed. With power, must be responsibility—with great power, great responsibility. To some one, the persons who had the custody of the prisoner must be responsible. To whom were they responsible? The Secretary had deprived them of the writ of Habeas Corpus; he had deprived magistrates of the power of visiting them. Here he admitted that a general intercourse with persons confined for treason might be dangerous, but the system of exclusion was carried a great deal too far. His hon. friend (Mr. Bennet), of whom, if he were not present, he would say, that a more valuable member had not a seat in that House, was refused admission to the petitioner; although the presence of the gaoler would have prevented him from saying any thing improper, even if he had been inclined. It was remarkable how the ideas of men had changed upon this subject. They all knew how a philanthropic gentleman (Mr. Howard) had obtained immortal fame by visiting gaols. He had himself appointed a gaoler in the county of Bedford, in which he was an heritor, for the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of his views respecting gaols. If this had been in the present day, that celebrated philanthropist would have been refused access by the very keeper whom he had appointed; and the order of the British Secretary of State would have been shewn to exclude him. An idea prevailed, in the debates on the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, that severity towards prisoners under this act was no great harm, since they were placed in confinement for their repentance. No notion could be more opposed to every principle of good government. He would put a case, to illustrate the iniquity of this idea. Suppose one of those confined for his repentance to be brought to trial, and to be acquitted, not from a technical defect of evidence, not from a jury's resistance to an exaggerated charge—and he hoped English juries would always shew such resistance—but upon the clearest evidence of his innocence. Suppose he who had committed him should afterwards meet him, emancipated, broken down in mind, ruined in fortune; he not thus address him:—"You committed me to prison for repentance, but I knew nothing to be repented of. You did me the greatest injustice. Go, you unjust man, and place yourself in my situation: count the hours of gloomy darkness as I have done (hear, hear); stretch yourself day after day, and night after night, on the bed on which I found no rest (hear, hear); feel in the cheerless dependency of a dungeon the misery of knowing that your wife and your children are ruined (hear); after you have had this experience, when you again propose a law to confine for repentance, perhaps you will qualify it with some consideration." He had dwelt longer on this point, because it had been said that there was no great harm in severity, and would operate in the way of intimidation. It would indeed intimidate, but it would intimidate the good as well as the bad; and that was the worst of all evils. We had now come to the turning point. We must go back to the first age, renounce our free Constitution, establish an arbitrary Government, and take all the machinery of despotism, foreign armies, arbitrary imprisonments, solitary confinements, without any specific object or limited duration; and above all, spies and informers as the authority for law, the evidence for trial, and the safeguard of Government: or we must take liberty with all its inconveniences. If any Minister was prepared to give up his birthright, to sell it for a mass of postage, he did not think that he would be successful. He did not think that the people of England were prepared to yield up the liberty purchased by the blood of their ancestors, without a struggle worthy of the cause. He would now advert to one or two points in the petition. The only part that had been denied was, that which related to the petitioners said to have been intercepted in its way to that House. Upon the respectable authority on which this denial was given, he was bound to believe it. Yet, if the man was in his sensor (and nothing appeared to shew that he was not), it seemed to him that he could not have alleged this charge but for either of two reasons. There were two positions, one of which was never presented, or the man was kept in such absolute seclusion, that he could not know whether his petition had been presented or not. The answer as to the issue was quite unsatisfactory. (hear, hear). If it was the practice in that prison to put people in irons, why was the petitioner committed to it? Another kind of answer was, that if a prisoner on a charge of robbery or murder was put in irons, why not for treason, which was a greater crime? The difference was in the nature of the commitment. None ought to be put in irons but for punishment. In cases of robbery and murder, there was a charge, a formal accusation, an examination, and a commitment by a disinterested person. In such a case as the present, the commitment was upon mere suspicion, without accusation, and by one who must be viewed not as a judge, but a party, an accuser. He would not dwell on the other points, though they might be hard; such as the felon's bed and the felon's fare, and the beautiful arcade. There was, however, one minute point, whose very minuteness constituted a claim upon their attention. It was the taking away of the unhappy man's flute, with which he might console a desolate hour. (Hear, hear.) He remembered a story of a man who was placed in solitary confinement having inside a spider his companion: he watched its motions, fed it, and taught it to spin its web in a peculiar way; but the malicious gaoles, observing the pleasure which he derived from this mode of diverting his mind, killed the spider, when the unhappy prisoner exclaimed, that he felt a pang more severe than he had ever endured. Was not the taking away of the flute an act of more barbarous cruelty than killing the spider? It appeared that the petitioner had been ruined in his trade through the rigour with which all intercourse with his friends was denied. He knew not whether this could be remedied, but it surely was a very great hardship. It was stated, too, that the circumstances in which he was placed would terminate his life. If, in consequence of the severity which was admitted to have been exercised towards him, he lost his life, it then turned out that it was not the power of arbitrary imprisonment that was given to Ministers, but the power of life and death. If the vigilant attention which ought to be exerted, but which was not exerted, could be neglected; if the answer could be returned, "How can we know what is doing in the interior of a prison?" then they sentenced prisoners, not to confinement, but to death. Let those who had voted for the measure take care of it. He had alluded to gaolers, whose characters, whose conduct, whose very names he did not know: but the right hon. gentleman had deprecated the idea of injuring the characters of gaolers by making inquiries of gaols. They who made no scruple of inquiring by suspicion and imprisonment, the characters of many innocent persons, were quite shocked at the thought of libelling the character of a gaoler, so far as inquiry would have that effect. It had been said, too, that a petition might easily be sent to the Secretary of State; but under what circumstances was the petition to be sent? Was it to be sent by the hands of the gaoler, against whom it contained complaints? (Hear, hear.) Many could not read nor write. One in such a condition has no money to procure the services of another person; he is excluded from his friends, or they are at a distance from him. Is he to apply to the gaoler to write a petition for him? (Hear, hear.) Even if the gaoler were to give his services, how was he to get paid for it? So much remained uncontradicted, that the House could not refuse to inquire; they were bound to weigh the powers conferred by that authority were properly exercised; and that as those powers were given only for purposes of protection, they should not be carried further. Ministers, if conscious of having acted improperly, should wish to make as publicly known as possible how they treated their prisoners. The causes of admittal were not to be divulged; but there could be no harm in divulging the treatment, which these persons experienced after admittal. He therefore moved "that the petition of Thomas Evans be referred to a Select Committee." (Mr. H. Addington.) In making a few observations on what had fallen from the hon. gentleman, would pass over the general topics on which he had touched, not from disrespect to the hon. gentleman, but because he did not think them relevant, and was unwilling to occupy the time of the House longer than was absolutely necessary. Even if the hon. gentleman had not spoken in terms of so much praise, for which he felt grateful, of his noble relation and himself, he should have been the last person to suspect him of any personal hostility. He certainly could not, however, have expected complaints from him against his noble relation. As to the petition alleged to have been withheld from the House, he had proved, to a demonstration, that it was not detained in the Home office. He had a receipt for it from Mr. Harmer, the Solicitor for Mr. Evans. It was the only petition that ever came from him to the office. He contended, that no severity had been exercised; and that the greatest attention was always paid to any complaints. Although magistrates were not allowed to visit at pleasure, it was perfectly open to any magistrate to apply to the Secretary of State for access to prisoners. There was nothing in the circular letter to gaolers to prevent that. He felt it his duty to exculpate the gaoler in this case; and he had this day sent for him, first, in order to be prepared to give satisfaction to the House; and then, that, if any thing new had occurred which might excite complaint, he might be qualified to state it to the Secretary of State, and to obtain redress. Of coals there was an unlimited allowance. Candles were allowed liberally, according to the seasons of the year. In summer few would be required; and no additional allowance could be made without application to the sheriff. One of the rules of the prison was, that no musical instrument could be allowed. If the flute could be allowed, no person would be more apt to feel the hardship of withholding it than himself. (A laugh.) The gaoler told him, that the reason why Evans was not allowed to walk in the garden was, that the way to it was through the felon's yard. The bed was perfectly new, and as good as could be afforded. If the prisoners did not think it suitable to their circumstances in life, and knew that they could afford a better, there could have been no objection to its being received, as well as other parts of furniture of which they might stand in need, or think it proper to order. The sheriff had given a satisfactory report; but not relying wholly on it, he had himself visited the prison that morning, accompanied by a member of the House, who, if

now in his place, would testify to the truth of the facts he had stated, and would contradict the allegation of the petition with regard to the cruelty of the gaoler. From a consideration of these facts, he should give the motion his decided negative.

Mr. B. Shaw, as he had been appealed to by the right hon. gentleman, was willing to bear testimony to the truth of his statement. He had seen and conversed with all the prisoners, who had no complaints to make against the gaoler or the magistrates. The elder Evans mentioned, that so far as his treatment was concerned, he was satisfied, but that liberty was sweet, and that no situation could be agreeable in which he was deprived of it. Pilkington, so far from complaining of any oppressive or harsh usage from the gaoler, said, that he regarded him with love and gratitude, as his friend and benefactor. The younger Evans had no complaint to make, except with regard to the supply of candle; and Ogden went even farther than the rest in giving his evidence to the kind behaviour of the gaoler; declaring, with tears in his eyes, that he should never forget the kindness which he had experienced from his hands, for, added he, "he has been to me a friend and benefactor in my distress." (Loud cries of hear from the ministerial bench).

Mr. Bennet said, he had never accused the gaoler of harsh conduct or gratuitous severity. But the question had no reference to the particular character of an individual; it went to the general system of treating prisoners confined under the Suspension Act. The right hon. gentleman had contradicted no material fact of the petition but one—that regarding the refusal of pen, ink, and paper. This he had denied; but he had good reason to believe that the right hon. gentleman was misinformed. The pleasure which the prisoners were said to enjoy in a fine view of the Surrey hills was now given up, and he believed that they enjoyed that view just about as much as he now enjoyed the prospect of the Thames. The next allegation was, that they were not supplied with light; and the defence set up against this charge was, that they were, so far as the rules of the prison would permit. The right hon. gentleman had spoken about an arcade in which they were allowed to walk; but if he had himself gone, as he ought to have done, and examined this arcade, he would have found that it was merely a narrow passage, into which the doors of the prison cells opened. In all those cases, the rules of the prison were thought a sufficient apology for the treatment these prisoners endured; but if Ministers suspended the liberties of the people, and threw men into prison on suspicion, they ought to correct these rules, so far as their treatment was concerned. The same rules prevailed in the Cold Bath Fields gaol, and in most of the other gaols of the kingdom, and the reason was obvious. These prisons were erected for confining felons, or persons accused or convicted of crimes, and not in contemplation of being filled by Government with individuals vaguely suspected of conspiring against the State. If Ministers proceeded with their new system of imprisoning, they should build new prisons, and not treat the victims of their power like the common disturbers of society. The whole of the statements were materially admitted. The complaints about the bedding—about the deprivation of light—about the taking away of the flute, and about being thrown into irons, were left uncontradicted. This last instance of harsh treatment seemed to him gratuitous cruelty; as he stated yesterday, that the gaol was more like a fortress than a prison, and that, consequently, all escape was prevented, without this oppressive precaution. (Hear, hear).

Mr. H. Sumner said, two magistrates of the county, accompanied by the sheriff, went to the gaol the day after the prisoners were committed. They were allowed, without any restriction, to view the whole of the persons confined, to observe the mode in which they were treated, and to converse with them. Mr. Evans complained that he was thrown into irons, and the gaoler stated, that such was the universal practice. The magistrates objected to this treatment; and, in ordinary cases, by virtue of the general superintendence with which they were intrusted, they would have ordered the irons to be removed, seeing no necessity for them. As the prisoners, however, had been committed under a warrant from the Secretary of State, they were uncertain how far their power extended. They recommended a memorial to be drawn up, and transmitted to the Secretary, which was immediately attended to, and the irons were in consequence knocked off. (Hear, hear). With respect to the gaoler, he could state, from his own knowledge, that he was a man of great humanity. The rooms in which the prisoners were confined were large and airy; but whether they commanded a view of the Surrey hills, he neither knew, nor did he think it important to be known. A good prospect was not necessary for a gaol; nor did he think that a place of this description should be made so pleasant as it could be made. The apparent cruelty of depriving the prisoner of his flute, he could not account for; but he could say, that in every other respect his wishes and amusements were attended to. He could procure as many books as he chose to order, and could have them changed as often as he wished. He therefore saw no grounds for inquiry.

Mr. S. Wortley said, he had never heard a charge more completely disproved than the present. He saw no reasons why persons charged on oath with being guilty of crimes against the State should be more leniently dealt with than those who were confined for less offences; but, allowing that they ought not to be so treated, why make such a complaint when immediate redress had been obtained, except for the purpose of creating unfavourable impressions? He was at first disposed to consider the taking away the flute as a piece of cruelty; but he was reconciled to it, when he heard it was the rule of the prison, and reflected that if might be troublesome to the other prisoners, whose comforts should be consulted as much as those of Mr. Evans. If this rule could be dispensed with, however, it might be better to do so, though the cruelty of the act had now been disproved. With regard to the want of ground for walking, he thought, that though the arcade removed some of the cause of complaint, the prisoners might be allowed to use the garden, if that indulgence could be permitted consistently with the safe custody of the prisoners. He made these observations because he had supported the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, believing in his conscience that the measure was necessary for the safety of the Constitution, and because he now saw that this was an attempt to bring it into discredit, by an allegation of cruelties committed under its sanction.

Sir F. Burdett said, the facts did not appear to him to be materially contradicted. The cruelty of depriving the prisoner of his flute was not denied, and a right hon. gentleman (Mr. H. Addington), who, from his fondness for it, could, no doubt, make this instrument "discourse most excellent music," sympathized with him, but defended the loss on the ground that no flutes were allowed in the prison. The comparison which had been made between this piece of cruelty, and that of killing a spider, the only society of a prisoner, appeared to him to be just and apposite, but it did not seem so good as that of an act done by a gaoler, who was accused of excessive humanity, and who was said to have kept the gaol, over which he was appointed, not like a prison but an hospital. An hon. and religious member, who had great weight with the House—

Mr. S. Wortley rose to order, and appealed to the Speaker whether one member could be allowed, by the forms of the House, to call another by ironical epithets. (Hear, hear.)

The Speaker said, that ironical epithets could not be employed; and he was sure the hon. baronet would see that the one which he had used was not a common designation by which one member could speak of another.

Sir F. Burdett said, he had not used the expression ironically, but distinctively: he was going on to state, that the hon. member had great weight with the House, and being appointed a member of a Committee to inquire into the abuses in Cold Bath-fields, he declared that Mr. Aris, the gaoler, was a man of excessive humanity. Another member of that Committee (Mr. Wilberforce Bird) had however mentioned to him a piece entered at his window to feed from his hand, and to be familiar with his motions: it was so much acquainted with him, and had so much confidence in his protection, that it even remained undisturbed when any one entered his cell. Mr. Aris, who seldom visited this abode of misery, happened one day to carry the prisoner's breakfast to him, and seeing the bird, which constituted the unhappy man's only society, he seized it with violence, and squeezed it to death. The man declared to his hon. friend, that he should not have felt a greater pang at the fear of his own dissolution, or the extinction of all his family. This was an instance of the humanity of a gaoler. An author, well acquainted with human nature, had said, that the steeled gaoler was seldom the friend of man." He should be glad to find that the charges against the present individual were unfounded. The Executive Government, however, now seemed to be the universal gaolers of the country; and as they were so, they should not advance the plea of the right hon. gentleman, that they did not know how the prisoners were treated. They were confined on no definite charge, and were to be tried at no fixed time; perhaps never tried at all; and if they were accused upon oath, it should be recollected, that it was the oath of spies and informers. One Oxley had been taken up and confined for months in Cold Bath-fields prison, which was popularly called Aris's Hotel. This person was put in solitary confinement: he was forgotten by the Minister, and when his case was mentioned, it seemed to excite surprise, and he was liberated without any inquiry. He had himself visited the prison at that time, and found in it 218 individuals. There was then no difficulty in visiting the prison; no magistrate was excluded, and no leave from the Secretary of State was necessary. It had been said, that if the prisoners were aggrieved, they might complain of the gaoler, and their grievances would be redressed; but it must be recollected, that that very complaint must be transmitted through the gaoler, the magistrate, or the Secretary of State, who were the parties interested in suppressing it.—In the present case, the petitioner had been above five months in custody, precluded from the due enjoyment of air and exercise; and surely such a case deserved the humane consideration of the House. The windows of his room were confessedly so high that he could not look out of them. Upon the impropriety of such rigour towards persons detained merely upon suspicion, and whom the law must presume to be innocent, he would read some high authorities. "It is more necessary," says Lord Coke, in his third Institute, "to be known how prisoners, to speak once for all, committed for treason or any other offence, ought to be demeaned in prison." Brac. 1. s. 54. saith, "Solent (gaolers) in carcere continendos dammare, ut in vinculis contineantur, sed ejus modi interdicta sunt a lege, quia carcer ad continendos non ad puniendos habere debeat." that, for its atrocity, set all comparison at defiance. He stated that a prisoner, confined in a narrow cell, 6 feet by 8, had taught a robin which

(P. 85.) "It is an abuse that prisoners be charged with iron, or put to any pain before they be attained." And the author of the Mirror of Justice says, "And because it is forbidden that none be pained before judgment, the law requirith, that none be put amongst vermin, or in any horrible nor dangerous place, nor in any other pain; but it is lawful for gaolers to fetter those they doubt, so as the fetters weigh no more than 19 ounces for those who are outrageous, violent, &c." But all legal, equitable, and humane authorities had protested against any degree of rigour to prisoners, especially before trial and conviction. If Ministers wished to remove suspicions, and not to excite disaffection, there were no means so efficient for both as by agreeing to the present motion.

Lord Castlereagh admitted that persons confined under the act for suspending the Habeas Corpus ought to be treated with all the care and indulgence consistent with their situation; but the reasons urged for referring the petition to a Committee would be an argument for adopting the same course in each individual case which might be brought before them. He did not deny that circumstances had arisen in the course of this discussion which would lead to a correction of the evil; and the presumption was, that whenever an abuse did exist, it would not be long before it came to the knowledge of Government; who would be disposed to pay the utmost attention to it. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Cochrane could conceive no question more momentous, or more entitled to the attention of the House, than one which related to the liberty even of the humblest individual. The House had been employed during the whole Session in destroying the liberties of the country. (Cries of order.)

The Speaker said, it was hardly necessary for him to declare that it was contrary to every principle of order to assert that the House had been employed in destroying the liberties of the people.

Lord Cochrane lamented that he was sometimes too incautious in his expressions, and that the habits of his life had not enabled him to be always sufficiently on his guard against legal quibbling. Perhaps if he had said, that the House had been engaged in suspending the liberties of the people, he should not have subjected himself to animadversion. Mr. Evans was, he understood, a Spencean, and hence, he presumed, arose the apprehensions respecting him, though, for his own part, he believed the doctrines of Joanna Southcote about as dangerous to the safety of the State as the reasonings of this unfortunate prisoner. He did not think such a system of injustice and misgovernment could be long endured in this country; or that, after the next dissolution of Parliament, Ministers would be suffered to retain the power of arbitrary and indefinite imprisonment. With regard to the grievances set forth in the petition having been redressed, he had marked no less than fifteen of the most important allegations, of which no notice had been taken.

General Hope said, he had that day seen the place of Mr. Evans's confinement. The room had two windows, certainly rather high, but 6 feet broad, and 4 feet long, and which admitted as much light as the windows of that House. He had an arcade, into which his room opened, to walk in, 50 feet in length, ten feet high, and six feet broad. Various other rooms communicated with this passage; and when he was there, the doors and windows of them were open, and afforded access to a free circulation of air. From one of these windows he understood that Mr. Evans amused himself with viewing through a telescope the distant hills, and it certainly appeared to him a very unobjectionable place of confinement.

Mr. Barham considered, that many of the allegations in the petition had been admitted. It was not the course of his life to attempt to inflame the public mind, but it was his duty to speak out when he saw his Majesty's Government pursuing measures which he thought equally calculated to work the ruin of the country and of themselves. It was a miserable defence to say that such or such was the invariable practice of the prison. There was no complaint against the gaoler, any more than against the magistrates of Surrey, who appeared to think this a good opportunity of panegyrizing one another. (A laugh.) It was desirable that the explanation should have been more full and certain in some points; but if he had the assurance of Government that every exertion would be made to prevent hardships, and to alleviate the sufferings of these unfortunate people, as well as to facilitate their means of communicating their complaints, it would not, perhaps, be necessary for him to take the sense of the House on this occasion.

The motion was then negatived without a division.*

Thursday, July 3.

Lord Colchester was introduced by Lords Redesdale and Dynevor, and took the oath and his seat.

The Earl of Liverpool moved an address to the Prince Regent, for a return respecting certain offices in Guernsey, Jersey, and other places, which it was expedient should be before Parliament.

CONSPIRACY.] Lord Montford rose to ask a question of the Secretary of State, respecting three men of the names of Brock, Pelham, and Power, who had conspired to seduce three unfortunate Irishmen into the commission of a capital offence, in counterfeiting the coin, in order to get the rewards for the discovery and conviction of such persons. These conspirators had been tried at the Old Bailey, and convicted; but as they had not yet suffered for their crime, he wished to know whether they had been pardoned, or whether their punishment was to be mitigated; and in case they were pardoned—freely or partially pardoned—whether that arose from any favourable circumstances in their case, or from doubts in the minds of the judges with respect to the law as applicable to their crime. It was of great importance that the explanation should be given, as otherwise a very erroneous impression might rest on the public mind: people in general knowing nothing farther than that persons condemned for such a crime had been pardoned.

* It has since been stated, that Lord Sidmouth had given directions that Mr. Evans should have the free use of his flute.

Lord Stanhurst fully concurred with the noble lord as to the enormity of the crime; but the real state of the case was this—these persons were still under sentence of death in Newgate, but execution had been respited. If it should turn out that they could not, from a defect in the law, be brought to punishment, care would be taken that the law should be amended in that respect.

[REFORM, &c.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition of inhabitants of Chelsea, in favour of Parliamentary Reform, and against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. In presenting this petition, he was anxious to call their lordships' attention to the obstructions which the petitioners had met with in endeavouring to accomplish their object of petitioning Parliament for a redress of grievances, or what they conceived to be such. If the circumstances stated to him were true, he felt much more alarm for the Constitution, on account of these proceedings, than he did from the plots and conspiracies which were made the pretence for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. The people were desirous to meet in the most regular way, and applied to the churchwardens, who, however, thought proper to throw every obstruction in their way. They had attempted to meet at a tavern, but that was prevented; and at length, after a great deal of difficulty, they met in the open air, and the petition was unanimously agreed to. These obstructions were highly criminal in those who resorted to them, and must be disgusting even to the Executive Government itself. Nothing could have a stronger tendency to irritate the minds of the people, and he trusted that this would be the last instance of such a proceeding.

The petition was read, and laid on the table.

AMENDMENT BILLS. The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of the English and Irish Exchange Offices Abolition Bill.

The Marquis of Landowne said, that on looking at the preamble of this bill, he had discovered that two little words had been omitted, which, though little in themselves, were however of great importance. In this bill, the exemption was extended to existing interests; but the words "legally vested," were omitted. It might be convenient to retain some of these offices, but no credit could be justly taken for a disposition to consult the great object of public economy, if offices were to be preserved, and the salaries paid at the very moment when these offices were solemnly declared to be useless. The observation, he admitted, applied only to a few, perhaps only to one of the offices in the bills now before the House; but with reference to the offices which yet remained to be regulated, and with reference to every proceeding of this nature, the principle was most important: it was recognized in Mr. Burke's Act, in 1788, that no offices ought to be exempt, which were declared to be useless, except those in which the parties had a vested interest. He, therefore, moved that after the words "existing interests," the words "legally vested," be introduced.

The Earl of Liverpool objected to the laying it down as a rule, that offices ought to be regulated or abolished, merely because the parties holding them had no vested interest in them. There were some cases in which it might be doubtful whether the parties had or had not vested interests, but he was sure that it would be attended with great inconvenience and injustice, to act strictly upon such a rule as he had mentioned. It was agreed that freehold interests in these offices were as sacred as any other freehold interests; but even with respect to interests which were not freehold, it was a question of discretion, with reference to each particular case, whether the interest ought or ought not to be taken away.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that the doctrines of the noble earl (Liverpool) on the point of interests not vested, were recognized neither in the act of 1782, nor in subsequent measures of the same nature, and were denied in the Report of a Committee of the House of Commons, of so late a date as 1810. If these bills were to pass at all, the rule ought to be, that interests not vested, ought to be put an end to; and if the question of expediency arose with respect to any office, the expediency ought to be shewn in the particular case. As to quitting professions and other situations of emolument, for the sake of these offices, he did not know what profession the Lord Privy Seal of Scotland had quitted. The same observation applied to the Lord High Admiral, and to several officers, such as Muster-masters and others in Ireland. The proposition of the noble earl, therefore, stood on very corrupt doctrine, and care ought to be taken that such doctrines did not steal into these bills, from which, God knows, the public would derive but little benefit. If the bills were to be passed at all, there could be no pretence for rejecting the amendment.

The Marquis of Landowne said, he was aware that compensation had been given for some offices not held for life, but that was only in cases where effectual services had been performed. It was not always given, however, even where effective service had been performed. Clerks had been discharged, and properly discharged, at the end of the war, by hundreds, without compensation; and if this was the case with respect to persons who had rendered effective service to the public, were their lordships now to be told, that offices were to be retained for those who had rendered no service? Was the language to one description of individuals to be this:—"You are poor, and have done service to the public, and therefore you are to be dismissed from your offices;"—and that to another description of persons to be—"You are rich and powerful, and have done no service to the public, and therefore your offices are to be retained?" The proper principle was, that when an office was declared to be useless, no salary ought to be attached to it, unless the person holding it had a vested interest in it.

The Earl of Liverpool stated, that in all cases where the clerks had been on the establishment, compensation had in fact been given. It was not so in the case of those who had been employed for a limited time, and merely on extraordinary occasions, though even there, compensation had in some instances been given, so that the noble marquis was mistaken upon that point.

The bill was then read a third time.*

The Marquis of Lansdowne moved his amendment, that the words "legally vested," be introduced.

The Lord Chancellor said, that the introduction of these words would make no difference in the meaning of the bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale felt extremely curious to hear, how it could be made out that these words would make no difference; and he believed every noble lord in the House could not but feel the same curiosity. It appeared a sort of riddle, and he hoped his noble friend would not send them home thus puzzled, but would condescend to solve the riddle, for the information and satisfaction of the House.

The Lord Chancellor would with great pleasure gratify his noble friend and the House; and, therefore, he stated, that in his opinion, every office held during pleasure was a vested interest, until that pleasure was recalled. The noble marquis, in order to attain his own object, ought rather to propose a proviso, that nothing in the act should protect interests in offices held during pleasure. He wished also to say, that the opinion he had given was one about the correctness of which he, by accident, had no doubt. (A laugh.)

The Earl of Lauderdale said, there were eminent lawyers who thought that interests legally vested were not exempt from parliamentary regulation. It appeared from the Report of the Committee on Public Accounts, that Sir Arthur Piggott was of that opinion.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that he had given no opinion, except as to the effect of the words proposed to be introduced; but he was glad to have this opportunity of saying, that there was no man for whom he had a higher respect, than for Sir Arthur Piggott.

The Marquis of Lansdowne then moved, "that nothing in the act should protect interests not vested."

The amendment was negatived, and the bill passed.

The other Abolition Bills, including the Signet and Privy Seal Clerks' Bill, and the Civil Service Recompense Bill, were then read a third time, and passed.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] The Archbishop of Canterbury moved the commitment of this bill.

The Earl of Harrowby approved of the general principle of the measure, but thought that the provisions for enforcing residence were not sufficiently strict, as the numerous exceptions would deprive the bishops in too many instances of the power of compelling residence.

The Archbishop of Canterbury could assure the noble earl, that the prelates of the present day were not indifferent with regard to the residence of the clergy, but felt as acutely on that question as any of their predecessors ever had done. It was his wish that there should be a resident clergyman in every parish in the kingdom, and he hoped that object would soon be accomplished.

The Lord Chancellor stated, that the acts passed since 1803, relative to the clergy, in which himself and a near relation of his, (Sir W. Scott) had had a part, had all been of great utility, and particularly that bill which altered the law with respect to common informers. He regretted that the present bill had come up at so late a period of the Session, that he could not, consistently with his other avocations, give to it all the attention he could have wished.

The House then went into the Committee. Several verbal amendments, moved by Lord Harrowby and different learned prelates, were discussed, and some adopted. The Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, July 3.

NABOB OF THE NORTHERN CIRCARS.] A Petition of the Nabob Rookmoo Jah Cochool Mulk Bahader, for restitution of his patrimonial estate, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

NEWFOUNDLAND TRADE.] Mr. M. A. Taylor rose and moved, that the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Trade to Newfoundland, and into the situation of that Settlement, be read. It was accordingly read, as follows:

"Your Committee have commenced their inquiry into the state of the Newfoundland fisheries, as well as into the very distressed situation of the persons settled in that Island.

"They first examined those Merchants who were best able to detail to them the present condition of the residents of St. John's, and in the different Bays occupied by British subjects.

"The evidence on these points was so uniform, so decisive, and so afflicting, that it was thought, from its pressing urgency, to be a duty incumbent on your Committee to lay before the House, without delay, the opinion of the sufferings experienced by the great majority of a very extended population, amounting, unless speedily provided against, to the certainty of absolute famine; and which has already involved in its consequences the violation of private property and the destruction of civilized order.

"Unless, through the intervention of Parliament, some immediate relief shall be granted, it is the opinion of your Committee, that the horrors of the ensuing winter will, if possible, be still further aggravated and increased. It appears also to your Committee, that the Trade itself has experienced a serious and alarming depression: the causes from which this has arisen will require, in the opinion of your Committee, in the ensuing Session of Parliament, a much more detailed and accurate investigation; but enough has been shewn by the testimony of respectable witnesses, to prove, that unless some aid is afforded to the merchants before this House separates, the Fisheries will be most materially injured; the Capitals embarked in it by degrees withdrawn; and the nursery for Seamen, hitherto so justly valued, almost entirely lost."

The hon. member then repeated several of the observations which he made on a former occasion (see page 1437.) respecting the distressed state of the Trade, and of the population of Newfoundland, adding, that Mr. Kemp, of Pool, had stated to the Committee, that he had a capital of 60,000*l.* employed in the Trade—that he lost last year 20,000*l.* and that he should lose the same sum this year; and, therefore, it was impossible for him any longer to carry on so ruinous a concern.—So satisfied was that gentleman that he should be subjected to the same loss on continuing the Trade, that he had written to his agent, stating, that he should send out no outfits or supplies, but what his own servants would require till they could convey his stores to England. What, it would be asked, could be done with this starving population? But he would ask in return, were these people, because the Trade was not so thriving as to induce merchants to continue their capitals in it, to be left to all the horrors of famine? The merchants requested that 5000 of the population might be removed by Government. He observed the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson) smile—perhaps he thought this number was too small—perhaps he expected that he should ask Government to remove 15 or 20,000. But he had to state, on the part of the merchants employed in the Trade, that if 5000 persons were removed, they thought they could find employment for the rest. The merchants said they could not meet the French in the European market; that the fishing part of Newfoundland had been conceded by treaty to France; that the French Government were exerting themselves by bounties to support the Trade. Our merchants in the Spanish ports laboured under a duty which amounted almost to a prohibition. Murat, when he was Sovereign of Naples, levied a duty on the fish imported into his States, for the purpose of ransoming slaves in Algiers; the present King of Naples, though placed there by our arms, had increased that duty. So that our merchants had not only to cope with the French bounty, but with the Spanish and Neapolitan duties. The Committee stated, that the causes of the distress required, in the ensuing Session, a more detailed investigation; but they had seen enough to warrant them in stating, that unless some relief was afforded in the mean time, the capitals employed in the Trade would be withdrawn, and the nursery for our seamen almost entirely lost. He should merely move at present, that the Report be taken into consideration; but it was his intention afterward to move, that a Committee of the whole House be appointed to consider the propriety of granting, for one year, a bounty of 2*s.* a quintal on all fish caught and cured in Newfoundland.

Mr. Robinson said, when a case of great distress was laid before the House, and above all when a great proportion of that distress must be admitted to exist, it was not a very agreeable task to object to any specific proposition for relieving it. But, in the situation in which he stood, he felt that he should ill discharge his duty if he did not state the grounds on which he considered this proposition to be ill advised. The hon. gentleman only recommended a bounty to be given for one year. The merchants said a bounty for one year was worth nothing to them. They said last year, that the Government of France had given the French traders a bounty on their fish; and that, without we gave such a bounty, it would be impossible for them to carry on the trade. But if we were to undertake to run a race of bad policy with every foreign nation that chose to set us the example, there would be no end to such applications. The merchants wanted the removal of 15 or 20,000 persons. But where were these persons to be sent to? The far greater part of them came from Ireland. But there were cases of distress at this moment in Ireland beyond any thing that had been reported of Newfoundland. Were they to be sent to Ireland, to be supported there, God knows how? Were they to be sent to Canada? The harvest was very bad in that quarter last year; and it would be only aggravating distress to send them there. Government agreed, if the merchants would move 1000 of the people to Canada, to find subsistence for them for one year, and to give them land to settle on. But the merchants rejected this offer as a perfect joke; and refused to listen to any proposition by Government, unless they would go the length of the bounty co-existent with the French bounty, and remove 15 on 20,000 of the population. As to the case of Mr. Kemp, the trade was of so fluctuating a nature, that one year on a capital of 20,000l. a profit of 20,000l. might be made, and another year a loss of 20,000l. be sustained. During the last war, the trade acquired an artificial prosperity, and if the House attempted to support it by means of bounties, the evil would be aggravated ten fold. This would only have the effect of increasing the population. Under these circumstances, he could not consent to the motion.

Mr. Holdsworth said, if the planters of Newfoundland did not receive some relief, the population must be left to starve.

Mr. W. Douglas said, it was quite impossible for the merchants to employ many of the distressed. Last winter, the disturbances in the settlement increased in such a degree, that it was impracticable to protect property and order.

Mr. Canning did not think that we should enter into a contest with France in a line of promoting commerce by means confessedly impolitic; but he had himself received such accounts of the losses and sufferings of the merchants and inhabitants of Newfoundland, that, if any temporary aid could be given, it should not be withheld, though such encouragement to one branch of commerce might seem to contravene the general principle of political economy. He thought a case had been made out, which, allowing the principles of his right hon. friend (Mr. Robinson) to remain uncontradicted, called for the interference of the House.

Mr. Newman was disposed to grant a temporary relief to the colony, although he felt the objection that attached to the system of bounties. In considering the sufferings of that unfortunate people, dependent wholly on foreign supply for support, a comparison could not be made with the distressed in Ireland, where there was a prospect of a good harvest, and great mitigation from benevolent subscriptions.

Mr. Protheroe said, the question before the House was purely one of humanity. (Hear.) The two hon. gentlemen opposite (Mr. Robinson and Mr. Goulburn) had come to the Committee, as he thought, determined against all relief; and, with a sort of ministerial tactic, had contrived to turn the attention of its members from the strong point of humanity, to discussions on political economy. (Hear.) A clear case of distress and threatened famine was made out; and if Ministers, after being warned of the evils that might ensue in the following winter, took no means to guard against them, and to protect these unhappy people from starvation, they would incur a heavy responsibility.

Mr. F. Lewis was aware that the question was purely one of humanity, and it ought to have been stated as such. There was no reason for coming down to the House with proposals of bounties, defended on false and exploded theories of commerce and political science. (Hear, hear.)

It was said, that if we did not support this trade by a bounty, we should be deprived of it; but if it could not support itself otherwise than by a bounty, it must be a losing concern; and the sooner we lost it the better. Then there was the argument about its being a nursery for seamen, an argument that had borne on its back the impolitic regulations of centuries, and which was always at hand to sanction every unwise proposal for extending our commerce. All kinds of trade were nurseries of seamen as well as this, and the same argument might be brought for giving bounties, if necessary, to our West and East India trade. If a subscription were proposed, he was sure that the merchants, and other benevolent individuals, would come forward, as they had done on other occasions, to the assistance of the sufferers; but he could not agree to raise taxes on this distressed country, to remove distress at a distance. There was almost no species of suffering, no extremity of distress mentioned as the lot of the people of Newfoundland, to which he could not find a parallel at home. Why was not relief extended to Wales, to Ireland, and Scotland, by Government? The answer was plain—Government had no adequate relief to bestow. It could only assist one part of the population by a tax upon the other; it could scarcely meet the demands made upon it; it could scarcely procure means for paying the interest of its debt, and supporting its necessary establishments; and it did so only by imposing burdens on the country which it was scarcely able to support.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed that this question was purely one of humanity; and that the only thing to be considered was, what relief could be granted, and how the grant could be most beneficially applied. He was surprised to hear it stated, that Government were obliged to support the people of that colony. Government did not encourage their emigration, and could not be accountable for their fate. Every mode of relieving their distresses, however, would be resorted to. Government had already extended relief to the sufferers by the fire at St. John's; and were still disposed to make further exertions, as soon as they knew, from local suggestions, how much farther assistance would be necessary, or how it could be best applied. The dangers of famine were said to threaten the population of Newfoundland, but he believed they might be warded off by the abundance of fish which they could command. He objected to the bounty, as its effects would be only to enable other nations, who imposed a duty on our imported fish, to increase that duty, and thus make the people of this country pay their taxes. It was no reason for giving a bounty because France followed that line of policy; our finances would not bear us out in an impolitic contest of this nature.

Mr. Baring thought that, in a case of such distress, our finances were not so exhausted as to prevent us from extending relief, if only £8,000*l.* was demanded. In the principles of economy which had been stated he perfectly concurred, and rejoiced to see that the commerce of the country, after being so long subjected to impolitic regulations, was now likely to be governed on wiser and more liberal maxims. (Hear.) He was of opinion, that no trade which could not support itself should be encouraged by a bounty; but if there was to be any exception, this was a proper case for making it. The Newfoundland trade, more than any other, was connected with our naval power, from its being a nursery for hardy and adventurous seamen. He could not say how many seamen were employed by France in the Fisheries; but from the great bounty of 50 per cent. by which she encouraged them, they must rapidly increase her naval means, and enable her to enter into a formidable competition with us on any future occasion. This system deserved to be watched by Ministers, and they ought to calculate the consequences of the whole of the Newfoundland fisheries being in the hands of our rivals. The provisional treaty of the noble lord seemed to him to be impolitic, from its tendency to increase the power of those in whose favour its provisions appeared to have been made.

Sir T. Acland said, all that was now moved for was, that the Report should be taken into consideration, and in the Committee an address to the Crown, or any other measure likely to attain the end in view, might be adopted. The right hon. gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had, by allowing inquiry, held out the hopes of granting some assistance, which should not now be withdrawn.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared that the state of this colony had occupied, and would occupy, the serious attention of Government. In the case of St. John's, they took upon themselves the responsibility of administering the requisite relief, and they would do so in the present instance. He could not mention now what particular direction would be given, as that would depend on local information, which Government did not yet possess; but he thought that a discretionary power should be lodged with the governor, to grant such relief in cases of extreme distress as seemed to him expedient. (Hear, hear.)

Gen. Gascoigne asked what relief, and to what extent, the governor would be allowed to grant?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that a discretion would be lodged with him to act on his own responsibility, and according to circumstances. The House then divided:—

SAVINGS BANKS.] The English and Irish Savings Banks Bills were read a second time.

FINANCES. The debate on the Public Finances was deferred from Friday till Wednesday next.

PENSIONS TO WOUNDED OFFICERS.] On the motion of Mr. Banks, a copy was ordered "of any Circular Letter from the War Office issued since the 1st June last, relating to Pensions granted to Officers in respect of Wounds received on Service*."

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS' OATHS BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

ALNAGE ABOLITION BILL.—DEPUTY REMEMBRANCER'S REGULATION BILL.] These bills were read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

SMALL RENTS DISTRESS BILL.—LAND TAX REDEMPTION BILL.] These bills were read a third time, and passed.

FRAME-BREAKING BILL.] The Solicitor-General moved that the House should go into a Committee on this bill.

Mr. J. Smyth said, that, upon a question which he considered of such great importance, namely, the addition of one more to our present heavy penal laws, he thought it his duty to request of the hon. and learned gentleman to inform him, whether there was any other reason for the introduction of this measure than the recommendation of the grand jury of Nottingham.

The Attorney-General begged to assure the hon. member, that it was in his contemplation to bring this measure forward before the occurrence of the late events. Many of the persons who were Luddites had been made instruments for other purposes; but he considered this bill as directed at no other object than Luddism.

The House then went into a Committee, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

brought before the Commons, and read a first time. [His name and name of the bill.]

IRISH ELECTIONS.] On the motion of the Earl of Lincoln, the Irish Election Bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] This bill was reported, with amendments, and ordered for the third reading on Monday.

Friday, July 4.

LUNATIC ASYLUM (SCOTLAND) BILL.] On the order of the day for a Committee on this bill, Lord Binning moved that the Committee be put off for three months, and gave notice of a bill on that subject early next session.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OFFICERS OATHS BILL.] This bill was considered in a Committee, and reported; read a third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN WALES.] Mr. C. Wynn, in presenting to the House the Report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Administration of Justice in Wales, observed, that the country were indebted for this inquiry to one of the most valuable members who had ever sat in that House (Mr. Ponsonby), the cause of whose absence was so much regretted by all of them. (Hear, hear.) He could not allow this opportunity to pass without bearing testimony to the benefits which would accrue to the country from this inquiry, originated and prosecuted with so much zeal by his right hon. friend. He concluded with moving that the Report do lie on the table.—Ordered.

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. C. Wynn moved the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Brougham observed, that the clauses introduced into the bill during its last stages had materially altered it, and that the amendments might be known to the House, he moved, that the bill, as amended, be printed.

The House divided:—

For this Amendment . . . 2

Against it . . . 60

The bill was then read a third time, after which, Mr. Calcraft moved an amendment, to leave out the clause respecting the not admitting persons to their freedom after the issue of the writ. The House divided on the question that the clause stand part of the bill:—

Ayes, 55, Noes, 23.

The question was then put, "that the bill do pass." The House divided:—

Ayes, 54, Noes, 10.

The Bill was accordingly passed.

POOR LAWS.] Mr. S. Bournes brought up the Report of the Committee on the Poor Laws. In moving that the Report do lie on the table, he observed, that the Committee had conceived it most advisable, as no relief seemed practicable this session, to delay their Report till they could make a statement of the character, effect, and tendency of the whole system. That the Report had not been made before was owing to a tardiness on the part of the Committee; they had given the subject their whole attention. As an instance of the effects which would have attended partial statements, he mentioned that before the recess, the Committee had determined to alter the law of settlements; but, from further inquiry, they were of opinion that it should be abrogated altogether. How would the House have been situated, if they had been left to proceed on such contradictory recommendations? The subject of the Poor Laws had attracted the attention of great men ever since the time of Lord Hale, and it would not have been decorous for the Committee to have decided per saltum on difficulties, which neither the splendid talents of Mr. Pitt, nor the vigorous understanding of Mr. Whitbread, had been able to remove. As to the time, though its distresses had exposed the evils of the system, it rendered the attempt to remedy it more difficult. "The hour of the hurricane was not the time to repair houses."—They would be able to proceed to its remedy under better auspices after a genial season and an abundant harvest, and, in the meantime, the Committee would have an opportunity of correcting any error into which it had fallen, or to confirm those statements which were correct. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calcraft said, that in an early part of the session he had expressed his surprise that no communication had been made from the Committee, and he was not yet satisfied as to the propriety of the delay. The country had expected that after the meeting of Parliament, some remedy would be applied to the defects of the Poor Laws. He was not ignorant of the difficulties which the Committee had to encounter. The present delay might be for the best, but the disappointment to the country was unfortunate, as, under such unparalleled distress there had been a general expectation that some relief, or at least alleviation, would have been suggested.

Lord Castlereagh said, that though there had been a strong expectation in the country of some relief, the House had too much sense to expect that the Committee should, without full examination, have recommended decisive measures. If any blame attached to the Committee, he was entitled to a full share of it; for he had been of opinion, that no recommendation should be made previously to an examination of every distinct feature of the subject. In every week the Committee had sat three days at least, and often day by day. The House would now be enabled to learn the sentiments of the Country on this subject, for it was not enough to know abstractedly the best on such a question, but what the country was prepared to concur in. Great as the difficulties of the subject were, he did not doubt, that in the next session the House would be able to take a comprehensive and useful view of it. He expressed his admiration of the labours of the Committee, to which he had not always been able to attend, and stated his intention to move for its revival in the next Session.

* Sir E. Brydges's bill "for altering the laws relating to the Removal of the Poor in certain cases," which was brought in on the 21st February (see page 373.) and was read a third time on the 9th of June (see page 1339.) did not proceed beyond its first reading in the Lords. That bill, as amended on recommendation, went to enact, that persons renting a tenement, the value whereof should consist in whole or in part of pasturage rent for cows, or which should be hired under separate contracts, should not gain a settlement thereby, unless the yearly value of such tenement, exclusive of such pasturage rent, should be 10*l.* or inclusive of it 20*l.*

The Report was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Huskinson suggested, that an additional number of copies should be printed, to be sent to the clerks of every sub-division of magistrates in England and Wales, as the House might expect some useful information from the practical knowledge of those who carried the laws into execution.

After a few words from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Speaker said, it would be understood that the suggestion should be attended to, as it appeared to meet the wishes of the House.

PALE-HOUSES REGULATION BILL.] Mr. Bennet moved that the report of this bill be taken into further consideration.

Mr. S. Wortley said, that it was a material inconvenience to those members who felt deeply interested in the opposition to this bill, to be obliged to attend day by day at this late period of the session. He proposed that the bill should be postponed to the next session, as there was no possible chance that it could meet with a fair discussion this year.

Mr. Bennet said, that from the sort of opposition which had been raised against this measure by many persons in the House, as well as by brewers and others out of doors, he had not the smallest hope of being able to carry it through this session, but he anxiously wished, before the recess, that this subject should have been fully discussed, that the country might have seen what sort of arguments could be urged against it. For his own part, he should put up his protest, in the name of the morals of the people of England, against the opposition which had been made to an attempt to ameliorate a system which contained more seeds of corruption, and was more fatal to the good habits of the people than any which had yet prevailed in any civilized country.

The report of the bill was then ordered to be taken into consideration on this day three months.

CHAPELS BUILDING BILL.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Committee on this bill was put off till this day fortnight.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS BILL.]

On the motion for the third reading of this bill, Sir G. Hill proposed an amendment, that it be read a third time this day three months.—Mr. V. Fitzgerald opposed the amendment, and the House divided. For the third reading, 46; against it, 8.—The bill was read a third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER OFFICES REGULATION BILL.] The lords' amendments to this bill were read, and agreed to.

EXTENTS IN AID BILL.] This bill was read a third time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer adding a clause by way of rider, empowering persons confined under an Extent, to apply to the Barons of the Exchequer during term, or to any Baron of the said court during the vacation, to be discharged, provided it should appear that they were entitled to such discharge.

Mr. W. Smith said, there were many points connected with this subject, which still required amendment, and which he hoped would be brought under the consideration of the House next session.

Mr. H. Davis expressed the same opinion, after which the bill passed.

FRIVOLOUS ARRESTS BILL.—EMPLOYMENT OF THE POOR AMENDMENT BILL.] These bills were read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, July 5.

The Cottage Exemption (Scotland) Bill, was read a third time, and passed.

The reports of the Alnage Abolition Bill, the Irish Lunatics Asylum Bill, and the English and Irish Saving Banks Bills, were received, and the bills ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

Monday, July 7.

BURDETT, v. ABBOT.

v. COLMAN.

PRIVILEGES OF THE COMMONS.] It will be remembered, that, in the year 1810, Sir Francis Burdett was committed to the Tower, under a warrant issued by the Speaker of the House of Commons, for having published a libel on that House; the said libel being contained in a letter from "Sir Francis Burdett to his Constituents, denying the power of the House of Commons to imprison the people of England." Sir Francis afterwards brought an action against Mr. Abbot, the Speaker, and Mr. Colman, the Sergeant of the House of Commons; and the case having been argued in the Court of King's Bench and Court of Exchequer Chamber, and on both those occasions decided in favour of the Speaker and the Sergeant, was now brought by two writs of error into the House of Lords for decision in the last resort; and there argued, the Judges being present.

Mr. Brougham and Mr. Courtenay argued the

The whole of the case might be resolved into three questions; 1st, whether the House of Commons had the power of imprisonment for contempt; 2dly, whether, if it had, the warrant in this case was a proper one for the purpose; 3dly, whether, if the warrant was good, it was properly executed?

First, as to the power or jurisdiction of the House of Commons, the fundamental principle for which the plaintiff contended was admitted in the judgment below, namely, that where another matter came before a court of law, to which other matter a question of breach of privilege of either House of Parliament was incident, there the court must deal generally with the question of privilege. Then the principal matter in this case was the trespass; and the privilege came incidentally into question: and if the matter of privilege was brought into question at all, it was argued, that the Court could not confine itself to a general point, whether the House of Commons had the power of punishing by imprisonment for a libel, as a contempt or breach of privilege; but ought to require that the libel should be set forth, that it might decide whether the individual had been rightly punished in the particular case. The argument for the House of Commons, which might in this case be identified with the defendants, was, "We are the judges of our own privileges, and we will answer no charge of this nature; because if we do, we must bring our privileges in question into the courts below, and in the other House of Parliament." Consistently with that argument they ought neither to have appeared nor pleaded at all. But they did plead, and though they refused to try whether the individual was rightly punished, they raised the question, whether they had the power of punishing in this manner generally, and consequently their privileges had been brought into question in the courts below, and now in their lordships' House, the supremacy of which they denied, except as to the precedence of the individual members.

In a question, inter apices juris, it was something to shew, that every step they took led to absurdity. It was clear, from the admissions, that the courts might discuss and decide whether the House of Commons had a general class of privileges; and, upon decided cases, it might be considered as also settled, that the resolutions of the Commons were not conclusive as to their having a power or privilege generally; and, therefore, the courts might be compelled to inquire into the particular case, so far as to enable them to decide whether the House had the privilege generally. Suppose the House were to revive the old claim of privilege from arrest for the members of Parliament, the courts would deny it; and, in order to enable them to do so with effect, they must inquire into and decide on the merits of the particular case. Suppose that on the face of the warrant there was something obviously absurd, or beyond the jurisdiction of the House—ex. gr. that the commitment was for a trespass on the fishery of a member of Parliament: that A. B. and C. D. should be put back to back on a horse, with labels on their breasts, setting forth their offence, and compelled, in this situation, to ride round Charing-cross (cases which did happen); or that A. B. (which did not happen) should be put to death. If any of these things were to appear on a return to a Habeas Corpus the court would take cognizance of the particular case, and give redress. This conclusion followed from the admissions; and another conclusion was, that privilege was not of so delicate a nature as to be mentioned out of doors only to be obeyed. The courts might deal with it, and had sometimes dealt with it rather roughly. Then, if the courts would so proceed where such things appeared on a warrant or return, was it not manifestly absurd to say, that the Commons should be allowed to defend themselves by involving the matter in obscurity? If it might by possibility happen, that the court would deny the privilege if the particulars were set forth, was the House of Commons to be permitted to do that indirectly which it could not do directly?

But then the Commons said, that it was necessary for their existence, and the exercise of their functions, that they should be the sole judges whether a particular act amounted to a libel on themselves, and such a libel as entitled them to punish by imprisonment. The courts below had the power of punishing for contempt, and it would be inconvenient, they said, if they should not have that power. The inconvenience, however, was not all on one side; for the Commons might do wrong, and yet upon their principle there was no redress for the injured party, for the House of Commons could not be impeached. The judges below might be impeached, or might be removed upon address by the two Houses of Parliament, and before the Revolution they might be removed by the Crown. But the judges below were subject to control in the exercise of this power, and the House of Commons was not. The courts below proceeded according to a certain known rule and form in these cases, and the accused party was heard on the same terms as the accuser. In the House of Commons the party was heard in answer to a vague accusation, and then the greater part of the charges were brought forward against him after he had withdrawn, and judgment was given against him in his absence. The prerogative of the Crown was defended in the courts below, and why not the privileges of the Commons? It was no answer there to say that an act was done by command of the King; but the question was, whether it was legal, and what harm could result from compelling the House of Commons to say yes or nay, so as to bring the question of the legality in each particular instance before the Court? But it might be said that the court below might liberate the prisoner, and that the decision might be affirmed in Dom. Proc. That, however, was putting an extreme case, and the objection did not come well from them who accused the other party of putting extreme cases; and the objection was so much the less weighty, because the Commons had in some cases abused the power, whereas no instance had been shewn where the courts below had been unwilling to support the privileges of the House.

It had been farther contended for the Commons, that their claim rested on an uniform train of decisions, and uninterrupted practice; but the proceedings in many of the cases relied on as authority had been wild and extravagant, and rested on claims of privilege which could not now be supported, and had, in fact, been abandoned. In the case of Hall, 23 Eliz. the House had fined, as well as expelled and imprisoned; but Lord Mansfield had said it was clear they could not fine. Then, after this uniform stream had ceased to flow for three-quarters of a century, came the proceedings of the long Parliament, which claimed the privilege of making use of the King's authority against his person; and the case of Pitman, sentenced along with another person, for a contempt, to ride back to back on a horse round Charing-cross. After the Restoration, the same notions of privilege prevailed, as appeared from the case of Shirley and Fagg, where the Lords having admitted an appeal from the Court of Chancery against Fagg, a member of Parliament, the Commons ordered the counsel who were to argue the appeal to be taken into custody. Various conferences followed, and there the Lords decided a question of privilege claimed by the Commons. It appeared then that the current of decisions was neither uniform nor regularly admitted; that the privileges might be stretched at one time, and diminished at another; that there was no prescriptive right to this power, and no such power was given by statute. The Commons also claimed, in the time of Edward IV., that the goods of a member of Parliament should not be taken in execution. At other times, however, they did what would now be reckoned below their dignity—they applied peaceably for a writ of privilege. That came from the Crown, so that they applied to the Crown for the protection of their own privileges against the Crown. There were several other cases of the same description; but that of Admiral Griffiths, 28 Com. Journals, 1759, was a great privilege curiosity. Admiral Griffiths, a member of the House, complained that certain persons had entered on his fishery. The House appointed a Committee to enquire into the matter; and neither the House nor Committee entertained any doubt as to the jurisdiction. The Committee proceeded to try the question like a court of law, though more clumsily. The possession, the rent, the boundaries, the warning by the admiral, his refusal of licence, and the forcible entry were proved. The Committee then called on the other parties to answer, and they were heard by their counsel, but no witnesses were examined for them; and then the Committee reported that the parties were guilty of—what? a trespass? No—but a breach of privilege, they having entered the close of the said Griffiths, and fished therein. The House then ordered the parties to be committed; and, on their humble petition, acknowledging their offence, and setting forth their contrition, they were reprimanded on their knees, and discharged—paying their fees. So much for the lex Parliamenti, ab omnibus querenda, a multis ignota, a paucis cognita;—of which case Chief Justice De Grey said, that he wished he had some code of it, for that till he had, he could not judge of it.

Leaving these journal precedents to such considerations as they might appear to deserve, the cases where the courts had recognized this privilege of the Commons came next to be inquired into; and the Aylesbury case, 2 Ray. 205: Murray's case, 1 Wils.; and Rex v. Flower, 8 T. R. 314, were those chiefly relied on in support of the power. But upon all these this observation was to be made, that they came before the court upon returns to writs of Habeas Corpus, and that if the prisoners had been liberated, there would have been a direct and immediate conflict of jurisdictions. The House might have the power so far as it was necessary to remove obstructions; and it was not contended for the plaintiff that there ought to be such a conflict of jurisdictions; but where trespass was brought in the proper court, and a question of privilege was incident to it, the court of law ought not to be estopped from inquiring into the question of privilege, but ought to deal with it as with incidental questions of marriage or prize, which properly belonged to the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. It was admitted then, that the court of law would not liberate where there might be a direct conflict of jurisdiction; but did it follow, that a person illegally committed by the House of Commons was to have no redress? Suppose an officer, deriving his authority from the Crown, arrested a soldier illegally, ex. gr. because the soldier disobeyed an illegal order, upon a return to a Habeas Corpus, that the arrest was for disobedience of orders, the court would refuse to liberate or inquire into the matter: but suppose the soldier brought his action for false imprisonment, and it appeared that it was his duty to disobey, and that he would be punished for obeying, might he not have redress in that mode? According to Lord Kenyon's doctrine, in a case 1 East, 306, the King v. Suddis, the soldier might have redress; and yet the interference of the court in such a case would be a more delicate matter, and the case would be much stronger than the present. Let there be a remedy, therefore, in this case in damages, as there would be for the soldier. One might figure a case of such gross absurdity that the court could not refuse redress. Suppose the parties committed in the case of Admiral Griffiths had brought an action against him, for that he broke and entered their close, and Griffiths had pleaded the decision of the Commons; the House might imprison the parties for bringing the action, but would the court allow that sentence of the Commons to be conclusive as to the right of property? With respect to the argument that the House of Commons had the power because it was a Court of Record, it was submitted that the House was no court: it had no forms of proceeding as a court; and if its law was known to few, its practice was known to none. To support that position, that it was no court, Oates's case, 4, State trials, Jones v. Randoll, Cowp. 17, Shirley and Fagg before mentioned, and other cases were cited. In the late case of the King v. Creevy, a new trial was moved for on the ground that the publication of a speech in Parliament by the defendant was justifiable as being a proceeding of a court, but the new trial was refused.

But suppose the Commons had the power, his privilege of Parliament ought to have exempted the plaintiff from being committed for a contempt. 1 Hatsell. 131. Wilkes's Case, 2 Wils. &c.

Secondly, the warrant was not a good ground of commitment, for it did not pretend to commit for a contempt, but for a breach of privilege; and that was a libel, and a libel too on a past proceeding, so that it could not be an obstruction of a present proceeding. The mere naked fact here was, the admission that the letter was printed by the plaintiff's authority, and how could the admission be a breach of privilege? Besides, there was no allegation of publication of the libel, and therefore it could not be a breach of privilege: because, for any thing that appeared in the warrant, the libel might have remained in the plaintiff's table-drawer.

Thirdly. With respect to the execution of the warrant, there were two particulars—1st, in breaking open the outer door; and, 2dly, in using a military force. As to breaking open the door, the only authority upon which they relied on the other side, Semayne's case in Cro. El. would sink under their feet when it was examined in the more authentic report in Yelv. 28. Then, as to the use of the military, it had been contended, that they might be called upon to execute the warrant as citizens: but the allegation in the record was, that they were soldiers of our Lord the King, from which it appeared that they were employed as the King's troops, and not as citizens in red coats. But the warrant ought not to have been executed by soldiers, as the King's troops, because the law does not recognize soldiers, as was well stated by Atkins, in his defence of Lord *Russell. In East's re- port of this case of Burdett and Abbott, Lord Ellenborough (this was stated by Mr. Brougham)

this last Overt-Fail, or open-deed, a little further; namely, 'to seize and destroy the King's Guards.' The Guards! What Guards? What or whom does the Law understand or allow to be the King's Guards, for the preservation of his Person? Whom shall the court that tried this noble lord, whom shall the Judges of the law that were then present, and upon their oaths, whom shall they judge or legally understand by these Guards? They never read of them in all their law-books: there is not any statute-law that makes the least mention of any Guards. The law of England takes no notice of any such Guards, and, therefore, the Indictment is uncertain and void. The King is guarded by the special protection of Almighty God—he is guarded by the love of his subjects, the next under God, and the surest guard: he is guarded by the law and courts of Justice. The Militia and the trained-bands are his legal guard, and the whole kingdom's guard. The very judges that tried this noble lord were the King's guards, and the kingdom's guard, and this Lord *Russell guard against all erroneous and imperfect indictments, from all false evidence and proof, from all strains of wit and oratory misapplied and abused by counsel. What other guards are there? We know of no law for more. King Henry VII. of this kingdom, as history tells us, was the first that set up the Band of Pensioners. Since then the Yeomen of the guard; since then certain armed bands, commonly now-a-days, after the French mode, called the King's life-guard, ride about and appear with naked swords, to the terror of the Nation: But where is the law, where is the authority for them?"

It may not be improper to subjoin a brief history of our Military Establishment.—By the common law, the King could not, except in cases of invasion, or insurrection, levy or keep on foot any standing forces; nor were innkeepers, or others, compellable to quarter soldiers. In the Saxon times, the military force was not in the hands of the Crown, but of leaders chosen by the people. By the feudal government, the King could summon his vassals into the field, where they were obliged, for a limited time, usually 40 days, to serve him at their own expense: but in the reign of Henry II. personal service was dispensed with, by pecuniary commutation; so that though military tenures were not abolished till 12 Charles II. yet the personal service of the knights had, long before, fallen into disuse. Richard II. assembled an army of 4000 archers: they overawed the Parliament, and committed such excesses, that it formed one of the charges (Art. 5.) against him. From that time to the reign of Charles I. no standing army was in being. It was the Militia that sustained the holy war, and so successfully penetrated into France. In all the wars between the Houses of York and Lancaster, whoever prevailed, no standing army was established. Henry VII. raised 100 yeomen of the guard, which he augmented to 150—the whole standing army of his time. A regimented militia was established by Elizabeth, but she had no standing army. When the Duke of Alanson came over to England, and for some time had admired the riches of the city, the conduct of the Queen's government, and the magnificence of her court, he asked her amidst such splendour, "where were her guards?" which question she resolved a few days after, as she took him in her coach through the city, when pointing to

was made to pronounce an eulogium of Chief Justice Pemberton, who presided at Lord Russell's trial. But as the House of Lords had said that the conviction and execution of Lord Russell was a murder (see Report of the Lords' Committee for inspection of examinations concerning the murders of Lord Russell, of Sydney, &c., 20th Decr. 1689); and as it had been declared by Act of Parliament, that the conviction of Lord Russell had been procured by undue and illegal return of jurors, by refusal of lawful challenges, and by partial and unjust constructions of law, there could be no accuracy in the Report. It was well known that the troops existed only by sufferance from year to year; and so jealous was the law of their interference, that they were removed from assize towns at the time of holding the assizes, and also from the place of election, at the time an election was in progress. In the next place the Commons could not employ the soldiers without application to the Crown, and then what became of their privileges? If they required soldiers to execute their warrants, it was a strong argument against the existence of the power; and this was one of the many proofs that the grounds taken by those who argued in favour of the existence of such a power in the House of Commons involved them in inextricable difficulties.

the people, who received her in crowds, with repeated acclamations, 'These (said she), my Lord, are my guards: these have their hands, their hearts, and their purses, always ready at my command.'—Neither James I. nor Charles I., before the commencement of the Civil War, had any considerable body of troops.—In 1628, the House of Commons remonstrated against an army in time of peace, and against Buckingham's standing commission as General. At the conclusion of the Civil War the ruling power found itself at the head of a large army, great part of which was afterwards maintained by Cromwell, for the support of his government. His army amounted to 20,000 foot, and 10,000 horse. The disbanding of Cromwell's army was, by Cromwell's advice, one of the first acts of the reign of Charles II. but he kept up a body of troops, merely by his own authority for guards to garrisons. At his death, the standing army amounted to 8500.—On account of the Rule of Brevenouth's invasion, it was increased by James II. to 15,000; and afterwards to 30,000, all paid from his own Civil List; but this was illegal, and it has been said, "it was a riot and unlawful assembly, every hour it stood."—This led to the Declaration in the Bill of Rights, "that the raising or keeping a Standing Army, within the Kingdom, in time of Peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law." Soon afterwards, the framers of that Bill obliged King William to dismiss his Dutch guards; but they passed an Act, called the Mutiny Act, which allowed the Crown to maintain a body of troops for one year. This Act, which has been since passed annually, is the only authority for a standing army, who are ipso facto disbanded at the end of the year, unless continued by Parliament. (See Maddock's Life of Lord Somers, and Lord Somers's tract, intitled a "Letter balancing the Necessity of keeping a Land Force in times of Peace, with the Dangers that may follow on it.")

The Lord Chancellor said, that before their lordships proceeded farther, it would be proper to take the opinion of the judges on the following question—whether, if the Court of Common Pleas had adjudged that a person should be committed for a contempt, and the warrant stated that adjudication generally, without setting forth the particular circumstances, and the case had been brought before the Court of King's Bench by Habeas Corpus, and the return stated the warrant of commitment for contempt, whether, in such a case, the Court of King's Bench would liberate the prisoner, on the ground that the particular circumstances were not set forth in the warrant.

The question was accordingly put to the Judges, and they having consulted together for a few minutes, the Lord Chief Baron delivered their unanimous opinion, that in such a case, the Court of King's Bench would not liberate.

The Lord Chancellor then observed, that this was an important, but not a difficult case. If he had thought it difficult, or had any doubt about it, he would have been anxious to hear the counsel for the defendants; but being clearly of opinion, that the House of Commons had the power of committing for contempt—that this was a commitment for contempt—and that the contempt, if that was necessary, was sufficiently set forth in the warrant—and that the objections in point of form had not been sustained; unless any other noble lord stated it to be his wish to hear the counsel for the defendants, he would move that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

Lord Erskine rose.—He said, that when this matter was first agitated, he had conceived that the House of Commons intended to pursue a very different course, and he had certainly felt serious alarm at the nature and extent of the claims of privilege, which he imagined were to be set up by the Commons, and had spoken on the subject with warmth. But he entirely concurred in the opinion, that the House of Commons had such powers and privileges as were necessary for their protection, and that these privileges formed part of the law of the land. Here the Speaker of the Commons had proceeded as in the case of an ordinary subject. He had put himself on the country as to the fact, and pleaded a justification in law; for it was not a plea to the jurisdiction, but a plea in bar. This gave him heartfelt satisfaction; for if the judges had decided against the defendants, it was to be taken for granted that the House of Commons would have submitted. It would be a libel on the House to suppose the contrary. By this course of proceeding and judgment, therefore, it appeared to be the same law which protected the rights of the subject, and the just privileges of the House. The case had been argued with great propriety; but it had been said that the warrant did not allege that the plaintiff published the libel. It was stated, however, that the manuscript had been sent to the publisher of the Weekly Register, and printed by the plaintiff's authority; that was sufficient—for if he sent a manuscript to the publisher of a periodical paper, and did not restrain or object to the printing of it, and it was printed, he was the publisher. The word reflecting, separately considered, was too vague; but the allegation was, that this was a false and scandalous paper, reflecting on the just privileges of the House of Commons; and it must therefore be understood as an allegation, that the publication arraigned the just privileges of the House of Commons. He concurred then in the opinion of the learned judges; and it was to be observed, that in that House, the highest court of error, they thought it no derogation from their privileges to consult the judges in matter of law. He had himself, during the period when he presided in the Court of Chancery, committed two persons for contempt; and he thought it absolutely necessary that every tribunal should have this power, without which its character, dignity, and usefulness, could not be maintained. The House of Commons, whether a court or not, must have that power, because it is necessary to protect it from obstruction and insult, and to maintain its character in the world. This was necessary for the protection of the House of Commons, upon the same principle which rendered it necessary for the preservation of the dignity of courts of justice. If the dignity of the law was not sustained, its sun was set never to rise again. He spoke with warmth, because he felt strongly the necessity of supporting the character and dignity of the law; and had now nothing farther to say, than that he fully concurred in the opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

The counsel were then called in, and informed that the House did not think it necessary to hear the counsel for the defendants; and the judgment of the Court below was, without farther proceedings, affirmed.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The Royal Assent was given, by commission, to the Sheriffs in Ireland Bill; the Exchequer Offices Regulation Bill; Justices in Eyre Bill; Offices (Ireland) Abolition Bill; Clerks of the Signet and Privy Seal Bill; Offices (Scotland) Regulation Bill; Civil Services Recompense Bill; Board of Trade Bill; Mint Offices Regulation Bill; the Paper Drawback Bill, and the Irish Prisons Bill.

The Frivolous Arrests Bill, the English and Irish Savings Banks Bills, Irish Grand Jury Presentments Bill, Election Laws Amendment Bill, the Deputy Remembrancer's Regulation Bill, and the Extents in Aid Bill, were brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Small Livings' Land Tax Bill, and Small Rents Bill, were read a second time.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] On the motion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, this bill was read a third time.

The Earl of Harrowby proposed several amendments, and among others, to extend the exemptions from residence to masters in the great public schools; and enlarge the period of exemption already allowed to canons and prebendaries. The first of these amendments was negatived without a division; and the second, on a division, was negatived by 11 against 1.

The bill was passed, and ordered to be sent back to the Commons for their assent to the amendments.

Monday, July 7.

SAVINGS BANKS.] The English and Irish Savings Banks Bills, were read a third time, and passed.

FRAMERBREAKING BILL—LUNATIC ASYLUM (IRELAND) BILL—DEPUTY REMEMBRANCER'S REGULATION BILL—AID AGE ABOLITION BILL.] These bills were severally read a third time and passed.

STEAM BOATS.] Mr. Harvey moved for, and obtained leave to bring in a bill, "for securing the safety of passengers in vessels worked by means of steam." It was brought in and read a first time.

REMUNERATION OF CONSTABLES.] Mr. Galcraft moved, "that an humble Address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that he will be graciously pleased to direct to be issued the clear sum of 330*l.*, to the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, to be distributed by him in remuneration of the High Constable of Westminster, and the officers serving under him, for their various and arduous attendances upon both Houses of Parliament, for the session 1817." The hon. member observed, that they were almost all tradesmen, who suffered great inconvenience, and incurred considerable loss, by their constant attendance during the session; and his object was, not that they should receive complete compensation for their trouble, but a small remuneration for their loss of time. These officers served without pay, but they should be indemnified in part, and the small sum of 330*l.* distributed among them, for the performance of their various and arduous duties, would do nothing more.

Mr. Beaumont noticed, with great disapprobation, a practice which prevailed in the time of the late High Constable, of taking a fee of a guinea from some of the constables, to exempt them from the duty of attending on Parliament: by which a heavier duty was thrown upon those who did not submit to the extortion. He hoped this would never occur again. The present High Constable was a very respectable individual, and was known to be above such practices.

Mr. Banks objected to the grant; first, because it was an innovation, without sufficient inquiry into the circumstances; secondly, because he could not allow the claim; and thirdly, because it was brought forward at so late a period of the session.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to postpone the consideration of this question to a future opportunity, though he allowed that the claim was moderate.

Mr. Calcraft replied, that the present proposition was for a very small remuneration, not above 3s. a day to each constable for attendance, and not intended as a compensation, but as a diminution of loss. He hoped that this grant would be allowed, and the subject of a more systematic arrangement, if thought necessary, might be taken into consideration in the next session.

Mr. Osborne understood, that the High Constable and constables were already paid for their attendance.

Mr. Calcraft answered, that they were paid for their attendance on leves and drawing-rooms, but not one farthing for their service about Parliament, by the Parish, the County, or the Treasury.

The House divided—

For the motion, 22, Against it, 27, Majority, 5.

NEW STREET ACT.] Sir F. Burdett presented the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the case of the Norris Street petitioners against the Commissioners for executing the New Street Act. The hon. baronet said, that every claim was satisfied, and that the departure from the plan submitted to Parliament when the act passed, had been found to have originated in mistake.

Mr. Huskisson said, that in the early part of the session, a complaint had been made to the House by petition, that the plan sanctioned by the Speaker of the House for the New Street, was not the plan which had been carried into effect. This had proved to be true, but it had also been proved, that no blame attached to Mr. Nash and the other persons concerned; but that by mistake, a different plan had been presented to the Speaker for his signature, than that which had been agreed to by the Committee of the House. To prevent such mistakes in future, he should move two standing orders on the subject of private bills:—

1. "That every map or plan, and every schedule or book of reference thereto, which shall be produced before the Committee upon any private bill (whether the same shall have been previously lodged at the private bill office, or not,) shall be signed by the Chairman of such Committee, with his name at length; and he shall also mark with the initials of his name, every alteration of such map or plan, and of the schedule or book of reference thereto, which shall be agreed upon by the said Committee; and every such map or plan, and schedule or book of reference, shall thereafter be deposited in the private bill office."

2. "That every map or plan, and schedule or book of reference thereto, which shall be certified by the Speaker of the House of Commons, in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, shall previously be ascertained, and verified upon oath, to be exactly conformable in all respects to the map or plan, and schedule or book of reference, which shall have been signed by the chairman of the Committee upon the bill, including and specifying every alteration which may have been made therein by authority of Parliament."

Ordered,—That the said Resolutions be made standing orders of the House.

MADHOUSES.] Mr. Bennet moved for a "Return of the number of houses licensed for the reception of lunatics, in each city or town, which is a county of itself, as well as the names of the persons keeping them, and the number of lunatics therein confined." He took occasion to observe, that though a bill had passed that House on this subject, no one step had been taken on it in another place, though a person holding a high situation there (the Lord Chancellor) was the legal guardian of lunatics. By the return to the motion, the House would see the importance of some regulation on this subject. The motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.] Mr. Brougham brought up the Report of the Committee upon the Education of the Poor, which being read,

The learned gentleman stated, that it would be in the recollection of the House, that by the Report of this Committee in the last Session, a useful exposition had been made as to the extent and character of existing abuses in several charitable establishments for the education of the poor. Since then it was ascertained that in a particular district where 1500*l.* a year had been devised for the education of the poor, the rector of the parish, who, according to the will of the deviser, was to superintend the application of the money, appointed his own brother to be the schoolmaster, and to receive the salary. But this gentleman being very willing to accept the 1500*l.* a year, but unwilling to undertake any trouble, appointed as his deputy a journeyman carpenter at 40*l.* a year. This sum, however, that gentleman was not contented to allow, and it was in consequence of the attempt to reduce it still lower, that the Committee became acquainted with the fact, the rector desiring that the curate should undertake the business as a mere matter of form at 20*l.* a year, to which the curate replied, that if it were a mere matter of form, the rector might do it himself. Another case had come to the knowledge of the Committee, where the object of a bequest of 300*l.* a year in the North of England was defeated by educating only one boy, with a view merely to the form necessary to secure the amount of the bequest. But the Committee might have obtained infinitely more information, if they had possessed the power of extending their inquiry. Their power was, however, confined to the institutions of the metropolis, and such information as he had referred to was but casually obtained. The learned gentleman added, that the imperfect state of the Report which he had presented was attributable solely to his indisposition. But to accomplish the object of the Committee, he thought that commissioners should be appointed by Parliament with full power to inquire, to examine persons, papers, and records, and to remove from place to place. Such a course of conduct, especially with regard to moving from place to place was impracticable, it was obvious, on the part of a Committee of that House. Besides, the members of a Committee serving gratuitously could not be expected to devote so much time as was necessary to a thorough investigation of the subject in all its details. On these grounds he thought a Parliamentary Commission the more eligible course, and therefore he threw out the suggestion for the consideration of the House. The members of that commission he should propose to reward for their trouble by a certain per centage upon the amount of the abuses which they discovered, and from what he had heard of the abuse of such funds as he had alluded to, he had no doubt that the discovery would be considerable. The only difficulty would be as to the selection of proper commissioners, which he hoped, however, would be chosen without any reference to party attachments, or any view to jobbing or patronage. He trusted, indeed, that Ministers would see the necessity of appointing those Commissioners without any sinister considerations. The only other object to which he had to call the attention of the House, was, whether any pecuniary aid should be allowed to certain establishments for the education of the poor in the metropolis or whether those were objects with which it would be fitting in Parliament to interfere. But these points would naturally attract the consideration of the House at an early period of the next session.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow expressed his satisfaction at what the House had heard from his hon. and learned friend, but he thought that the inquiry of the Committee or Commissioners alluded to, should extend to all the endowed public schools in the country.

Mr. F. Blake was of opinion that this inquiry should also extend to Ireland.

Mr. Brougham observed, that he understood the suggestion of his learned friend (Mr. Serjeant Onslow) referred to such schools as Winchester, Eton, and Harrow, and should even include the Universities. As to those establishments, he had not heard that any suspicion attached to them, and he should think it objectionable to have the heads, for instance, of the eminent Universities alluded to, brought before any Committee or Commissioners, without any allegation or grounds of suspicion, as to their conduct in the application of the funds committed to their care. With respect to Ireland, a Commission had for some time existed in that country for inquiring into the conduct of charitable establishments, and from this Commission several very valuable Reports had appeared; and, therefore, he could not see the propriety of interfering with its labours.

The Report was ordered to be printed.

UNDUE REMISSION OF PUNISHMENT.] Mr. Bennet moved that the proceedings touching the case of the King versus Robert Hoy be printed, and stated his intention of submitting some measure respecting it early in the next session.

COPENHAGEN.] A petition was presented of merchants, &c. of London, having commerce with Denmark and Norway, respecting confiscated property (see page 1574.) The Prince Regent's recommendations being signified, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, July 8.

ELECTIONS.] The Election Laws' Amendment Bill was, on the motion of Lord Shaftesbury, ordered to be read a second time this day three months. The reason stated by his lordship was, that it was impossible at this late period of the session to give that attention to the provisions of the bill which their extent and consequence required.

The English and Irish Saving Banks Bill, the Frame-breaking Bill, Extents in Aid Bill, Frivolous Arrests Bill, the Exchequer Court Bill, and Grand Jury Presentments Bill, were read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, July 8.

CONSTABLES.] Mr. Calcraft gave notice that he would, on the first week of next session, bring under the view of the House, the subject of a remuneration to the high constable and constables of Westminster, for their attendance on the two Houses of Parliament.

Sir H. Parnell gave notice, that he would early next session, move for leave to bring in a bill for regulating the office of petty constables in Ireland. The system of the two countries should be assimilated with respect to the civil power; and the administration of the law ought to be inquired into for the purpose of finding a substitute for the employment of the military in keeping the peace.

POLICE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Bennet presented a Report from the Committee appointed to inquire into the Police of the Metropolis. For a great part of last session, and a considerable portion of this, they had been employed in investigating the abuses that prevailed in public house licensing, and on that system they had presented the result of their inquiries. The present Report embraced two subjects—the policy of granting what was called blood-money, or rewards on conviction; and the state of juvenile offenders. The magistrates whom the Committee had examined on the first of these subjects were unanimously of opinion, that the system of granting blood-money should be discontinued. They all complained of the pernicious effects that resulted from it; and they were confirmed in the opinion they had formed by the officers of courts of justice whom the Committee had called before them. These latter stated, that the rewards given on conviction held out a temptation for which witnesses often perjured themselves, and exposed the lives of innocent men. During the last summer there had been three trials for conspiracy to entrap the unwary, and procure their conviction, for the sake of the blood-money. It might be calculated to what an extent of wicked activity this system of granting rewards on conviction excited police officers, when he mentioned that it was reckoned a gainful trade to bring persons found about the streets to the police officers, and swear them vagrants without examination, for 10s. a head. These officers had been heard to say, that 10s. could not be earned so easy in any other manner: and that they doubted whether apprehending felons or swearing vagrants was the most profitable part of their occupation. (Hear, hear.) The increase of criminals of all sorts, and particularly of juvenile delinquents, of late years had been truly alarming, and it was melancholy to reflect that the greater part had been thrown into improper courses by the negligence of their parents, or the difficulty of procuring education, for they could neither read nor write. He next adverted to the mode of punishing convicts by transportation to Botany Bay, or confinement in the hulks, and strongly condemned both parts of the system. Transportation had entirely failed of producing the results expected: it produced no amelioration in the principle or conduct of the greater part while it was very oppressive to individuals, and entailed a heavy expense on the country. Those whose time of banishment was expired could not return to their country without the greatest hardship, and after a tormenting delay; and the females, especially, were more liable to be corrupted than amended by their transportation, as they could only find their way back by the prostitution of their persons in payment of their passage. From 1798 to 1813 the establishment at Botany Bay, and the transportation of convicts, had cost 2,433,326*l.*, and the hulks in the same period had required an expense of 948,612*l.* making in all 3,383,938*l.*; or, during fifteen years, at the rate of 225,588*l.* annually. During that period the charge of maintaining the hulks had arisen from 30 or 40,000*l.* to 93,594*l.* annually, which last was the sum expended in 1814.

Sir S. Romilly observed, that many convicts, sentenced to seven years' transportation, had been detained two or three years in the hulks, and after so much of their time had expired were at last transported. The information disclosed in the Police Report, respecting juvenile delinquencies, the evils of the conviction money system, and the extent of the existence of irregular houses unknown to the magistrates, but known and frequented by police officers, called for early and serious attention.

Mr. Butterworth bore testimony to the zeal and diligence evinced by the hon. Chairman of the Committee, who was entitled to the thanks of the country at large. He hoped the subjects of the Report would be taken up in another session. An instance had come to his knowledge, in which, for the purpose of obtaining the parliamentary rewards, police officers had paid counsel to prosecute persons who had entered into a squabble in the street without any malicious motives.

Mr. Goulburn said, no persons were transported for seven years, until those who were condemned for a longer term had been sent out. In the case of remaining two or three years in the hulks, the convicts had the option of being transported, or remaining the rest of their time in the same situation, and often preferred the former.

The Report was ordered to be printed.

MARRIAGE CEREMONY.] Mr. W. Smith presented the following petition:

"To the Hon. the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled:

"The Petition of the Associated Unitarian Christians of Kent and Sussex—Humbly sheweth,

"That your Petitioners, dissenting from the Established Church upon the principle that Christ is their sole head in matters of religion, are deeply impressed with the inconsistency of submission, on their part, to the marriage ceremony of that Church, as an act whereby its authority to decree rites and ceremonies is acknowledged, and this their leading principle of dissent is violated.

"That as Unitarian Christians, your Petitioners cannot exculpate themselves from the charge of a palpable violation of moral principle in joining in devotions addressed to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and particularly in receiving a benediction pronounced for the ratification of the ceremony, in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost.

"That finding that the British Legislature, in an act passed in the reign of his Majesty George the Second, relating to marriage, recognised the importance and sufficiency of such religious scruples, by exempting the Jews and Quakers from all obligation to submit to its provisions, so far as respected the members of their several communions; your Petitioners feel encouraged to submit their case to the consideration of your Honourable House, and humbly to petition, that they also may be allowed to marry among themselves, in conformity with their religious principles. And your Petitioners will ever pray."

The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

SESSIONAL ADDRESSES.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the usual annual addresses to the Prince Regent for conferring some dignity in the Church upon the Rev. Robert Stevens, Chaplain to the House, and for remuneration to the officers: Also, for a sum of 12,000*l.* Irish currency net, to the Commissioners appointed, in pursuance of an Address of the House of the 24th June, 1814, to inquire into the duties and emoluments of officers of the Courts of Justice in Ireland, as a remuneration for their services in the execution of the said commission for two years. Also, for the sum of 10,000*l.* for executing repairs upon the Cobb at Lyme, under the directions of the Master General and Board of Ordnance.—The consideration of the last sum was deferred.

SCOTCH LUNATIC ASYLUMS.] Lord Binning brought in a bill to provide asylums for the lunatic poor in Scotland, which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed; when the noble lord stated, that he did not intend to propose any farther proceeding upon it during this session.

STEAM BOATS.] On the motion of Mr. Harvey, the steam boat regulation bill was read a second time. It afterwards passed through a Committee, and the Report was brought up, and ordered to be printed. The hon. member then moved, that the Report be taken into farther consideration on this day three months*.

CATHOLICS—MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.] Sir H. Parnell rose to move for certain papers relative to the course of education pursued at the college of Maynooth. Many unjust reports, he observed, had been spread abroad concerning the principles of the Roman Catholics. Among other things it had been stated, that the College of Maynooth encouraged what were called the Transalpine doctrines. This charge was brought forward in a speech published under the name of an hon. member (Mr. L. Foster.) Now, the Transalpine doctrine meant a support of the temporal authority of the Pope—a doctrine which every Catholic in the United Kingdom would abjure, and to which the Prelates at the head of the College of Maynooth, some of whom had been in this country to afford information respecting the views of the Catholics, were well known to be hostile. It was strange that in the next paragraph to that in which this charge was made on the College of Maynooth, the hon. member stated that he had not been able to learn what course of studies was pursued at that College. Now the hon. gentleman could have such confidence as to the doctrines, while he was so ignorant as to the studies, he could not conceive. The resistance of the Clergy to the rescript of M. Quarantotti, was a pledge of their independence. That the Clergy of the Catholics were well disposed to the Government, was proved by their conduct not only in 1745, but in 1798. At the latter period all the leaders of the rebellion were persons under ecclesiastical censure. It had been stated, that the education which the Catholic Clergy communicated was merely a supply of moral poison. Such a statement could only rest on prejudice and ignorance, for nothing could be more moral than the tenour of the books which were circulated among the population of Ireland, and universally read in the Catholic schools. A notion prevailed in this country, that the Bible was prohibited in Ireland, while the fact was, that numerous editions of it had been published within the last year in Dublin. The version read by the Irish Catholics might be different in some, perhaps immaterial, particulars from that published by the Protestants, and it was notorious that there were several different versions of the Bible circulated in the Christian world; but it was quite a fallacy to state that the reading of the Bible was absolutely forbidden among the Catholics of Ireland, or of any other Catholic country. The address of the Pope to the Catholic Divines of Poland, as to this point, upon which so much comment had been made, was in fact totally misanderstood, as it would appear from accurate examination that that address or bull did not forbid the reading of the Bible, but was aimed at certain persons in Poland, who were endeavouring, by undue means to convert the Polish Catholics, which the Pope deprecated. But this was not the only calumny against the Catholics of Ireland. It was stated, that a College of Jesuits had been established in the county of Kildare, whereas the simple fact was, that the schoolmaster of the seminary alluded to had been educated in a College of Jesuits; but it by no means followed that he presided over a College of Jesuits in Ireland. The hon. baronet concluded with moving, that an address be presented to the Prince Regent, praying for "Copies or extracts of any communication received from the College of Maynooth, respecting the courses of education pursued in that College since the last return made on the 23d of April, 1813."

* This bill went to enact, that no vessel should be employed unless real terra and no registry should be granted, unless an engineer's certificate were produced, that the boilers were wholly composed of wrought iron or copper. Every boiler to have two valves, one of them to be inaccessible to the person employed in attending to the engine, and the other to be accessible to him, and to every other person on board the vessel. Boilers to be inspected once a year, by an engineer appointed by the Admiralty; such inspector to examine and try the strength of every boiler, and the degree of pressure it was calculated to sustain, by such means as might effectually prove the same; provided that in such trial the pressure used should be one third less than such calculation required; and such inspector to examine the safety-valves attached to such boiler, and certify the weight to be placed on the same, so that in no case such weight should exceed one sixth part of the pressure such boiler was calculated to sustain as aforesaid.

Sir J. G. Hippisley considered this motion as one of the most important that had occupied the attention of Parliament in the course of the session. Its tendency was to vindicate a most meritorious and important body of his Majesty's subjects against a tissue of calumnies. For those calumnies, however, some colour had been afforded by the conduct of men who professed to advocate the Catholic cause. Among those exceptionable advocates was the Rev. Mr. Gandolph, who, however, was suspended for his doctrines by the Vicar Apostolic in this country, and such suspension had since been distinctly approved of by the Pope, who also ordered the suppression of his works. As to the system of education at the College of Maynooth, he had reason to know that it was quite contrary to the Transalpine doctrines so unjustly charged upon it.—The hon. baronet then animadverted on the resolutions of the Catholic Aggregate Meeting in Dublin, on the 4th instant. Among those resolutions it was ordered, that a motion of thanks to the Rev. Mr. Hayes, proposed by Mr. Macdonnell, should be referred to the consideration of a Committee, in order to determine how the object of the motion could be rendered most effective. Now, the conduct of this Mr. Hayes, who was some time ago a Missionary from the Irish Catholic Board to the See of Rome, was such as could not have escaped the notice of the public. But among the most remarkable features of that conduct, it appeared, from a letter which Mr. Hayes had written to Mr. Macdonnell, that he wished Dr. Drumgoole, whose extraordinary speeches and writings in Ireland could not fail to be remembered, to be joined with him in the mission. Here the hon. baronet read an extract of a published letter from Dr. Drumgoole, to shew what an useful adjunct to such a mission the learned doctor was likely to prove. From this letter it appeared, that he had endeavoured to impress upon some Cardinals at Rome, that the power and influence of England had, by recent events, become too formidable for Catholic Europe; while its views were so decidedly hostile to the Catholic religion, that its object was to destroy that religion, not only in Ireland, but throughout Europe. Yet this was the man whom Mr. Hayes, the subject of panegyric at the late Aggregate Meeting, proposed to have associated with him in a mission from the Catholics of Ireland. This Mr. Hayes, however, was decidedly disavowed by all the respectable Catholics of Ireland, and had been actually turned out of Rome by order of the Pope, who said to him, "Depart, rash man!" The respectable Catholics must feel that such men were the worst enemies of their cause, and of the same description was the author of a book intitled, "A Statement of the Penal Laws," which, as the Irish Attorney-General justly said upon a prosecution against it, was one of the most mischievous works that had ever issued from the press. It was lamentable to think of the injury inflicted upon the Catholic cause by such ill-judged writers and advocates. They offended those whom it was their interest to conciliate, by the very terms in which they pressed their claim; for while they protested against every proposition of Veto, they pressed their pretensions as a matter of right, rejecting any concession as a boon. This, however, was not the general language of the Catholic body in Ireland, as appeared from the writings of Mr. Clinch, an eminent Catholic Jurist, who observed, that if the Catholics had all that they desired, the Protestants would lose nothing, for they would still retain the Protestantism of the Throne, which would form a landmark to shew that what the Catholics obtained was granted as a boon.—The merit of the Catholic cause was not to be determined from the writings or conduct of particular advocates, any more than from a few isolated speeches in that House. This great question could alone be fairly judged by a full inquiry into all its details. Such an inquiry was peculiarly necessary, and eminently due to the claims of seven or eight millions of his Majesty's subjects; for, including the colonies, that proportion at least of the British people were interested in this important subject. The hon. baronet, after adverting to a gross attack made upon him by Dr. Milner, who stiled himself the agent of the Catholics, but who, in point of fact, filled no such station, concluded by seconding the motion.

Sir G. Hill deprecated the unfair and disingenuous proceeding of the hon. mover, who had indulged in observations upon a speech delivered by an hon. friend of his during the present Session, and who was not then in the House. That speech had been published nearly six weeks before his hon. friend left town, yet during the whole of that period the hon. baronet never once attempted to animadvert upon it.

Mr. Butterworth begged to trouble the House with a few words respecting the Irish Schools and the British and Foreign Bible Societies. He had some knowledge of the schools which had been established in Ireland, and positively declared that neither the founders nor the teachers had the remotest intention of using their influence for the purpose of making proselytes. There was, however, a great opposition on the part of many of the priests and Roman Catholics, who had not acted so liberally as the hon. baronet had stated. The Bible Societies had not been instituted with a view to proselytism: those who distributed the word of God were content to let it produce a good effect on the hearts of those who read it, of what persuasion soever they might happen to be. The Pope's Bull was not issued in consequence of attempts being made in Poland by the Bible Society to convert Roman Catholics to the Protestant faith: it was issued to prevent the establishment of a Bible Society in that country; but the Emperor Alexander, who was at Warsaw soon afterwards, encouraged the institution, and placed it under his protection. The hon. member concluded with saying, that he felt no hostility towards the Catholics: but he knew that, in Ireland, they were very intolerant to their Protestant brethren. On this subject he need only refer to the Roman Catholic Bible, published at Dublin, last year, under the express sanction of Dr. Troy, the titular Archbishop.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald concurred with the hon. baronet (Sir G. Hill) in condemning the attack which had been made on the speech of the hon. member who was absent. It was well known, that he (Mr. V. F.) differed from the opinions which were promulgated in that speech; but he thought it unfair in the hon. baronet (Sir H. Parnell) to reply to it, when no answer could be given to his remarks.

Sir H. Parnell said, he had not been answering the speech of the hon. member; each of the topics upon which he had commented were to be found in the notes appended to that speech. The reason why he had not brought the subject forward earlier was, the pressing business which had occupied the House. He had intended to have submitted his observations when the Chancellor of the Exchequer took the usual annual vote for defraying the expenses of Maynooth College; but it was so late in the night that he was prevented.

The motion was then carried *.

Wednesday, July 9.

[CHANCERY SUITORS.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition from a person of the name of Roberts, complaining of delay in a Chancery suit in which he was a party, and praying that such assistance might be given to the Lord Chancellor, as would produce greater expedition in the decision of causes. His lordship ob-

* The following is the latest information on this subject.

A Meeting of the Titular Bishop and the Roman Catholic Clergy of the Diocese of Cloyne took place on the 27th of August, 1817. They passed several resolutions, of which the following is the substance:

They begin with asserting, that it is the conviction of the Conference that the Church of Ireland is in imminent danger, affirming, that they would be guilty of high treason against the King of Heaven, were they to conceal their sentiments from their Bishop, at a crisis so alarming. They then proceed to state their adhesion to the resolutions to which the Bishops agreed in August, 1815, against the Veto. In the fourth resolution they declare,

"That they contemplate with undisguised horror every measure which has for its object the concession of any such power to men who are ready to swear, and have already sworn, that the religion of the Roman Catholics, as practised in this United Kingdom, is superstitious and idolatrous."

The fifth resolution is directed against the plans sanctioned by Government for the education of the lower orders. The following is the resolution:—

"That the plans, sanctioned by our Government, for the education of the lower orders in this country, furnish us with an additional cause of alarm. Those schools, under the most specious appearances, have, in our apprehension, for their ultimate purpose, the proselyting of our poor Catholic children. We see immense sums of money levied annually for the maintenance and education of the children of Catholic parents, in establishments which are exclusively Protestant—the unwearied zeal, and increasing influence of Bible Societies and other Anti-Catholic Institutions for educating the poor of Ireland, cannot escape the notice of the most indifferent observer. In these schools a version of the Scriptures, not only unauthenticated, but disapproved of by the Roman Catholic Church, is made the school book of the poor Roman Catholic children, whilst every Catholic tract or explanation of the word of God is sedulously discarded."

The eighth resolution is a request to Dr. Coppinger to use his influence with his brethren, the Catholic Prelates of Ireland, to establish Domestic Nomination by Dean and Chapter; and to submit, whether it might not be expedient, at this period, to served that assistance had been given by the appointment of a Vice-Chancellor, and he trusted it had been found useful.

The Lord Chancellor stated, that he knew neither the person nor the cause. The appointment of the Vice-Chancellor had been useful to the suitors; but as to the Lord Chancellor, the only effect of it was to throw upon his shoulders business much more distressing in its nature, and the same in quantity as before.

The petition was laid on the table.

The Irish Election Laws Bill, and the Small Rents Bill †, were read a third time, and passed.

The Deputy Remembrancer's Regulation Bill was committed and reported, without amendment. [This bill proceeded no farther.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, July 9.

[CATHOLICS.] Sir J. C. Hippisley moved for a "Copy of the Concordat between the Court assemble a Synod for the purpose of averting the evils with which the church is threatened; of negotiating with the Pope in favour of the ancient discipline of the Irish Catholic Church; and of appointing an agent at the Court of Rome, to transact, at all times at that Court, the business of the Irish Catholic Church.

The ninth resolution is applied particularly to Dr. Coppinger, requesting the Right Reverend Prelate to apply to the Holy See for the appointment of a Dean, and to nominate a Chapter.

The following is the tenth resolution:—

"That we earnestly entreat of our brethren, of every diocese in Ireland, to afford to their respective Prelates their strenuous co-operation in opposing the Veto, and, by respectful and earnest application; to obtain from them their sanction for domestic nomination, on the basis mentioned in our seventh resolution."

† This bill enacts, that no person making any distress for rent, where the sum due shall not exceed 30*l.*, shall take more, either from landlord or tenant, than the following charges:—

Levying distress	0	3	0
Man in possession, per day	0	2	6
Appraisement, whether by one broker or more, sixpence in the pound on the value of the goods.

Stamp, the lawful amount thereof.

Catalogue, sale and commission, and delivery of goods, one shilling in the pound on the net produce of the sale.

Party aggrieved may apply to a Justice of the Peace, who shall adjudge trouble the amount of the monies unlawfully taken to be paid with costs, which may be levied by distress. Justices may summon witnesses, who must attend under a penalty of 40*s.* If complaint unfounded, Justice may give costs to the party complained against. No judgment to be given against any Landlord, unless he personally levies the distress. Parties not to be barred of other legal remedies. Signature of the Justice to be proof of the judgment. Brokers to give copies of their charges to the persons distrained.

of Portugal and the See of Rome, in the year 1778," which, after a few words from Mr. G. Allan, as to the inexpediency of granting further concessions to the Catholics, was agreed to.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] The Lords' amendments to this bill were agreed to.

LIVERPOOL PETITION.—HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Lord Selkirk said, he had a petition to present of inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood of Liverpool, for the repeal of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was necessary for him to state the circumstances which had attended the framing of this petition. On Saturday se'nnight a petition had been voted at a numerous meeting at Liverpool, against the renewal of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill, and was signed by 3,500 persons. This petition came too late to be presented. The gentlemen who had drawn it up framed another, which he held in his hand, in nearly the same terms. He was aware that, in point of form, it could only be received in behalf of the two individuals who had signed it; but he trusted it would obtain additional weight from the consideration of the circumstances which he had mentioned. (Hear.)

Mr. Brougham said, that as he was honoured by a resolution of the meeting, requesting him to support the prayer of the petition, he felt himself called on to state, not merely his entire concurrence in that prayer, but his knowledge of the facts related by his noble friend. The cause of the delay which had prevented the former petition from being presented, was, that the mayor had thought fit to keep in his possession for a week the requisition for a meeting of the town; he then said that he conceived the meeting unnecessary. The gentlemen who signed the requisition did not, however, think so lightly as the worthy mayor of the bill which suspended the British Constitution. Accordingly they presented another requisition, under the provisions of what was called the Gagging Act, and a meeting was held. The petition then agreed to, and signed in a few hours by 3500 persons, came too late to be presented before the passing of the Act, and the petition now presented would have been signed by as many persons, had it not been found impossible to send it back to Liverpool without running the risk of its being again too late, by the prerogative which would soon take place.

The petition was then read, as follows:—
"That the petitioners, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, respectfully, but firmly state to the House the deep anxiety which they cannot but suffer at the continued Suspension of the Act of Habeas Corpus, which is so justly characterized as the chief security of British freedom; they cannot but feel that their fellow subjects and themselves are degraded from the condition of freedom to that of slavery so long as their personal liberty is submitted to the will of the Ministers of the Crown; they cannot but be aware that those Ministers must exercise the extraordinary powers which have been conceded to them according to the suggestions of their under agents and supporters throughout the kingdom; of the disposition and conduct of these agents the petitioners conceive that a judgment may be formed from the fact, that at their instigation great numbers of their fellow subjects have been torn from their families, hurried up to the metropolis in chains, put into solitary confinement, and upon a strict examination have been dismissed as innocent men, but have returned home injured in their health and in their circumstances, without the least possibility of obtaining redress; the petitioners moreover beg leave to remind the House, that it is matter of public notoriety, and admitted in formal documents, that in various cases the above-mentioned agents of Ministers have excited some of the vast multitudes of their countrymen, suffering the extremity of distress, to acts, and that whilst the victims of their treachery have been left to suffer the rigour of the law, not one of these infamous instigators to mischief has been called to account for his conduct; contemplating with dread the operation of a system which subjects the whole community of these kingdoms to the atrocious machinations of mercenary spies and informers, who seek to repair their ruined fortunes by trafficking in the blood of their fellow subjects, and confident that the common course of law is sufficient to restrain any riotous proceedings which may be unhappily occasioned by any cause whatever, the petitioners earnestly intreat the House not to continue them in the condition of dependents upon the will of others, but, by repealing the Act for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, to restore them to the blessings of that freedom which was won by the firmness, the integrity, and the blood of their ancestors."—Signed, William Shepherd, Richard Preston.

Mr. Canning said, he had no objection to the petition being laid on the table, but it was to be understood only as the petition of Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Preston.

BRITISH CONSUL AT MASSACHUSETTS.] Mr. Brougham asked, whether the George Manners, Esq. who was appointed in the Gazette to the lucrative and honourable situation of Consul to one of the North American provinces (Massachusetts), was the George Manners who lived formerly in London, and was editor of that most infamous and slanderous publication The Satirist, whom he (Mr. B.) had seen stand on the floor of the Court of King's Bench, to receive sentence for a slanderous attack on a private individual?

Lord Castlereagh said, he had no knowledge of any charge against the individual in question.

Mr. Brougham said, that if it was the Editor of The Satirist, he could answer for the fact, as he had seen him receive judgment. He admitted that the leaning of the work in question was all on the side of the noble lord in politics.

SLAVE TRADE.] Mr. Wilberforce, in rising to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice, said, he had some satisfaction in the belief that every individual member of the House was now prepared to receive favourably the few observations which he meant to offer on this subject. When he considered the number of years during which the question was agitated, and the great men that took a part in it, his mind was overwhelmed with feelings of various kinds. His present object was, by proposing an address to the Crown, to give weight to the exertions of the executive power in its negotiations with foreign states. He lamented to say, that in the instance of powers which had already declared their intention to abolish the Slave trade, there were no appearances that they were disposed to carry that intention into effect; and that even subjects of some of the powers which had abolished the traffic were engaged in carrying it on. He was sorry to be obliged to state, that even under the flag of America, which, to its honour, was the first power which set the example of the Abolition, the trade was carried on; and there was reason to suppose, that American property and also American subjects were engaged in it. In the colonies which had been restored to France, the trade had also been carried on, though it was to be stated, to the honour of the French Government, that a governor who had sanctioned, and perhaps to some extent participated in the traffic, had been dismissed from his office. But at Goree and Senegal the trade had been carried on to a great extent; and as the native princes had not been in the practice of collecting slaves by war, they made up cargoes of their domestic slaves. In one instance only, on the Gold Coast, had he heard of the Slave trade being carried on under the auspices of Holland; and he had heard of no charge of the sort against Denmark and Sweden.—But the great evil, in comparison of which all others sunk into insignificance, was the trade as carried on by Portugal and Spain. And even the trade of Portugal, which confined its devastation to the South of the Line, was small compared with the ravages of the Spaniards. When he contemplated the whole conduct of Spain on the subject of the Slave trade, he could not sufficiently express his wonder, that a great and high minded and spirited people, which had made such efforts for its own liberation, should lend itself to the devastation and slavery of a whole continent. Till we abolished the Slave trade, we had been in the habit of supplying Spain with slaves, and an article in a celebrated Treaty stipulated for our privilege of being the carriers of Spain in this traffic. It now appeared from the conduct of Spain, as if she almost intended to ridicule our efforts for the amelioration of the state of Africa. It was known that we had chosen a certain part of the coast of Africa, in which we endeavoured to introduce a relish for the enjoyments of civilized life, and, to carry on this good work, it was absolutely necessary to secure it against the ravages of the Slave trade. To this end we stipulated with Portugal, that she should confine her trade to the South of the Line. France, before she abolished the trade, made the same stipulation. In the negotiations with Spain, that power also conceded that she would confine the trade to a certain part of the coast. But when Spain had to point out the particular portion of the coast, she chose that very portion which we had selected for our efforts for civilization. This was an insult almost too great for an independent nation to bear. It was supposed at first that this choice of Spain originated in mistake, but when the effect of her conduct was pointed out, she seemed to cling the more closely to it. Even in the paper which gave notice of this choice of the King of Spain, as if to ridicule us, it was boasted that he was entitled to the praise of Great Britain. All the consequences which had been predicted had happened. Great numbers of real Spaniards filled the coast, and greater numbers of others under the flag of Spain. In places where schools had been established, and efforts had been made to induce the chieftains to supply their demands for European comforts by peaceful industry and legitimate commerce, the Spaniards now came to persuade the little princes to return to their old habits, and supply themselves more expeditiously with European luxuries by selling their subjects or making war on their neighbours. Tribe was set against tribe, village against village, and family against family. Even an individual would crouch like a tiger in a thicket to spring forth on a defenceless woman, to seize her and drag her to captivity. If even those who wrote that cruel declaration (bad as they must have been), which authorized this trade, had known the horrors of that traffic, their nerves would not have enabled them to sanction it. When 30 years ago, the barbarities of the Slave trade were brought before the House, though it was not immediately abolished, an Act was passed to alleviate the sufferings of the slaves in the middle passage. At present, however, ships were crowded beyond all precedent. In a letter from Sir James Yeo, it was stated that in a vessel of 120 tons there had been conveyed 600 slaves. (Hear.) In one of the examinations before a Committee of the House, a captain of a slave ship having been asked whether the slaves (of whom he had carried 450 in a ship of 230 or 240 tons) enjoyed comfort, said, they enjoyed tolerable comfort; but being asked whether they had room to lie on their backs, he said they had not. What idea of comfort this person had, it was difficult to conceive; but if 450 slaves had not room to lie on their backs in a ship of 240 tons, what would be the condition of 600 slaves in a ship of 120 tons? (Hear.) He would now read to the House an affidavit of Lieutenant Eike, of his Majesty's ship Cumberland: It was made on the 17th March, 1815, and was in the following words:—"That the deponent on the 15th of February last went on board the San Joaquim, as prize-master, and continued on board her some days after her arrival in Simon's Bay, which was on the 19th of the said month: that he remained on board until the slaves were landed by virtue of a decree from the Court, and was actually superintending and assisting in their disembarkation; that when he first went on board, he was informed that the said vessel had left Mosambique only 29 days, at which time every person on board was in good health, and that 13 of the slaves had died during that period; that between the capture and their arrival in Simon's Bay the survivors were all of them sickly and weak, and nearly one hundred of them afflicted with the flux; that medical aid was afforded to those who required it; that the brig appears to have been built for a privateer, and for fast sailing, not for stowage; that the slaves were all stowed together, perfectly naked, and nothing but rough unplanned planks to crouch down upon, in a hold situated over their water and provisions, the place being little more than two feet in height, and the space allowed to each slave being so small, that it was impossible for them to avoid touching and pressing upon those immediately surrounding; the greatest part of them were fastened, some three together, by one leg each, in heavy iron shackles, a very large proportion of them having the flux; that they were compelled to perform their natural evacuations under these dreadful circumstances without being able to move, and to remain amidst their own excrement, which could not be cleared away until the said slaves were all disembarked; that between the 19th and 24th days of their being landed, 13 more died, notwithstanding good provisions, medical aid, and kind treatment, and 30 more died between the 24th of February and the 16th of March instant, all occasioned, as he in his conscience verily believes, and is firmly persuaded, by the cruel and inhuman treatment of the Portuguese owners; that more than 100 of them were, at the time of their landing, just like skeletons covered with skin, and moving by slow machinery, hardly maintaining the appearance of animated human beings; that the remainder were all of them emaciated, and in a sickly state; he says, that the pilot, upon being asked by Captain Baker, how many he supposed would have reached the place of their destination alive, replied, about half the number that were embarked; that from the time of seizure, till the said slaves were landed, the Portuguese owners fed and attended them, giving them two meals each day, one at seven in the morning, the other at five in the evening, but never allowing to each person more than half a pint of water at each meal; he lastly says, that he never saw brute beasts treated with such cruelty as the slaves on board the San Joaquim were treated by their ~~aford~~ owners."

This, said the hon. member, is a loathsome picture, but I beg to recal to the recollection of the House the expression of a right hon. gentleman, to whose eloquence on this subject I have often listened with the highest pleasure.

He said that true humanity consisted not in a squeamish ear, but in a feeling heart. This sentiment speaks its author, and renders it superfluous to name Mr. Fox.—Of the slaves procured by the Spaniards, the greater part were sent to the Havannah. By a paper which had been laid before the Cortes, it appeared, that there had been imported into that colony, from 1799 to 1811, about 10,000 slaves a year; and in the three last years, the importation had been much greater—amounting even to 25,000 a year. The pretence, therefore, that the Spanish colonies were denuded of slaves, was entirely without foundation. They had provided for themselves most amply. The Spanish and Portuguese flags formed also a cover for the illicit traders of other nations. What was very hard, our ships could not, according to law, be confident it was not Hooker's law, "the harmony of the world *," seize vessels carrying on this trade, unless they had carried the slaves from our own coast. The ships of Spain had committed direct acts of violence. They had driven away merchant vessels from the coast, to clear it for themselves. He should regard a war with them with greater complacency than the continuance of such a practice. We were bound to put an end to it, if we would have our own colonies supplied with any other trade. He wished all prosperity to the West Indies, so far as that was compatible with the interests of humanity. He would have the evil abolished by representation, by remonstrance, or by the expedient of receiving the colonial produce of only those who should have abolished the slave trade. In many places gentlemen of feeling and spirit had exposed themselves to much danger by their meritorious exertions against this system of waste and devastation. Mr. Raffles had thus distinguished himself in Java; Colonel Chisholm had, much to his honour, established a seminary of education at Goree; the Governor of Sierra Leone (Colonel Macarty) one of the most active and benevolent men, had so exerted himself that 1,363 children were then in a course of education. Why did he mention these facts? He did so, because he thought himself bound in justice while he condemned the conduct of those who still encouraged & carried on this inhuman traffic, to mark with becoming praise the exertions of those who endeavoured to put an end to its horrors; and because, while we took blame to ourselves for having suffered them so long to disgrace our national character, we were bound to honour the different conduct of those persons whom we ought to be proud to call our countrymen. He did so, because there was now every hope that by their perseverance in the good cause we had the prospect of introducing civilization, industry, peace, and improvement into Africa; and of repairing, in some degree, those evils which we had inflicted on that unhappy region. The success of those exertions had already been conspicuous, and excited his surprise more that it was so great than that it was not greater. He had alluded to one right hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox), now no more, whose conduct, in forwarding the cause of the abolition, he could not too highly praise; and he must now allude to the memory of another dear right hon. friend (Mr. Pitt), who joined with him in those efforts, and who was far from limiting the scope of his endeavours within the accomplishment of the abolition alone. His ideas for the improvement and civilization of Africa were formed on a large scale. His right hon. friend had thought, that we were bound not only to abstain from ravaging the coasts of that country, and carrying its inhabitants into slavery, but to relieve their sufferings, and to promote their happiness, as far as lay in our power; to extend to them the advantages of education, and the improvements of civilized life; and to compensate the evils of a long course of injustice and violence, by restoring to them internal tranquillity, and increasing their comforts by an amicable commercial intercourse. For the accomplishment of all these ends, if they ever could be realized, a complete abolition of the slave trade, either as carried on by ourselves or by other nations, was a preliminary step. (Hear, hear.) He would, therefore, conclude by moving an address to the Prince Regent, recommending vigilance and perseverance in this important measure. The hon. gentleman then read the following Resolution:

* "Of Law no less can be acknowledged, than that her seat is the bosom of God; her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage; the very least, as feeling her care, and the greatest, as not exempted from her power."—(Hooker.)

"That an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, most humbly to represent to his Royal Highness, that, in bringing to a close the other business of this session, a great and important duty still remains to be performed by Parliament—that of again submitting to his Royal Highness, in the most dutiful but urgent terms, the expression of our continued and unceasing solicitude for the universal and final abolition of the African slave trade:

"That we are grateful for the efforts already made, and for the progress which we have had the happiness to witness, in the achievement of this great work: That we rejoice that, in all his Majesty's dominions, this wickedness is now for ever proscribed, and that our laws have stigmatized it by severe and ignominious punishment:

"That we have seen with unspeakable satisfaction, that so many of the other nations, under whose flag this criminal traffic had formerly been protected, have now joined in the same prohibition, and have contracted with his Majesty, and with each other, the obligation of persevering in it, as in a duty from which they never can be released: and that our confident expectations of the universal adoption of that prohibition have been greatly confirmed and strengthened by that memorable declaration which was promulgated by the Plenipotentiaries of all the principal Powers of Europe, assembled in their general congress, a declaration which well became the just and powerful Sovereigns in whose names it was issued; proclaiming to their subjects and to the world, their deliberate conviction, that 'the African slave trade is repugnant to the principles of humanity and of universal morality;' and adding to that avowal, the gracious and solemn assurance of their earnest desire 'to put an end to a scourge which has so long desolated Africa, degraded Europe, and afflicted humanity.'

"That we must indeed deeply regret, that practices acknowledged to be of such a character should, even for an hour, be continued, and even tolerated under the sanction of any civilized and Christian Government; but that it is impossible for us to doubt of that ultimate determination by which these crimes and miseries will finally be terminated. This engagement has been deliberately taken, and publicly and unequivocally announced, and its performance is imperiously required by every motive of interest, and of honour, of humanity, and of justice:

"That we beg leave, however, with all humility, to represent to his Royal Highness, that the actual attainment of this great object can alone discharge our country from the obligation of pursuing it with unremitted attention, and with daily increasing earnestness; and that we cannot disguise from ourselves, the painful certainty, that the intermediate suspense and delay not only prolong, but greatly augment, the evil which we are thus labouring to remedy:

"That it appears to us but too notorious, that these crimes, hitherto partially checked by the prohibition of so many just Governments, and by the abhorrence of all good men, are now again renewed, and are carried on with fresh, and continually increasing activity; that many of the subjects of those Powers which have concurred in the abolition are found, nevertheless, still to pursue the same nefarious course: that the stipulations by which other Governments have consented to put limits to this evil, stipulations purchased by this country at the price of large sacrifices, are constantly, and almost openly disregarded, while the protection of the only remaining flag under which this wickedness can now be carried on without limit or restraint, and the intervention of the only nation to which its continuance is indiscriminately permitted, are used, not merely to protect this horrible traffic in the extent to which that people formerly pursued it, but as a sanction to its indefinite increase in their hands, and as a cover for the breach of the laws by which all other civilized communities have restrained their subjects from embarking in it:

"That, in humbly submitting these painful circumstances to the humane and enlightened consideration of his Royal Highness, we are sure it cannot be requisite to dwell upon the other and great evils which they necessarily involve. That this state of things has led, by manifest and necessary consequence, to a system of armed defiance and outrage, a system utterly destructive of all peaceful commerce, insulting to legitimate authority, and, in its effects and consequences, little, if at all, short of open piracy: that this system also impedes, or rather it altogether frustrates, the just and benevolent endeavours of those Powers who are labouring to introduce among the natives of Africa the arts and habits of civilized life; is productive of perpetual contest and irritation, leading not unfrequently to open violence between his Majesty's ships and subjects and those of the Sovereigns in amity and alliance with this country; and continually endangers even those relations, the maintenance of which is of the utmost moment to their interests and to ours, as well as to the general repose and tranquillity of Europe:

"To represent to his Royal Highness, that, being deeply impressed with the magnitude of all these considerations, we earnestly entreat his Royal Highness, that he will be pleased to pursue with unremitted activity those negotiations into which he has already entered on this most momentous subject: that he will establish for this purpose the most effective concert with those Sovereigns whose just and benevolent principles respecting it have already been announced to the world, in concurrence with his own; and that he will leave no effort untried to bring the present evils to a speedy and immediate termination, and thereby to prevent the future and still greater mischiefs which their continuance must inevitably produce:

"That we confidently hope that his Royal Highness's urgent but friendly representations will produce their desired effect; yet that, in justice to the great interests that are at stake, we cannot but feel it our indispensable duty, to express our confident expectation, that if all his Royal Highness's amicable endeavours should prove unavailing, the great Powers which at the Congress of Vienna so honourably announced to the world their abhorrence of the slave trade, as radically unjust and cruel, will deem themselves compelled by an over-ruling sense of duty, to adopt, however reluctantly, such a course of commercial policy, as, without infringing on the just rights of any other nation, will alone prevent their indirectly, but powerfully, contributing to the continued existence of this inhuman traffic:

"That there is one important truth which we beg leave most earnestly to press on his Royal Highness's most serious attention, a truth which painful experience has too fully taught us, that, however strong may be the prohibitions of the slave trade, and with how great sincerity soever they may be issued, they will prove practically inefficient, unless some general concert for ascertaining and bringing to punishment the offending parties be mutually established between the several Powers under whose flags this trade has been or may be carried on:

"That we must once more declare to His Royal Highness, that in enforcing these considerations on his Royal Highness's most serious attention, we are actuated not merely by the feelings of humanity, but by the positive dictates of duty and conscience: that it is by these motives, and not as claiming any superiority in point of humanity or of morals, that we are actuated in our earnest desires to obtain the co-operation of all other civilized nations: that, remembering how long and how largely this country contributed to augment the miseries and perpetuate the barbarism of Africa, we cannot but esteem ourselves specially and peculiarly bound, not to leave that vast continent in its present degraded state, but to endeavour, so far as we may be able, both by our own conduct, and in concert with other Powers, to repair the wrongs which we have inflicted, by opening the way for the diffusion of those blessings which, under the favour of Providence, a legitimate commerce and a friendly intercourse with the enlightened nations of Europe cannot fail to introduce in their train."

Lord Castlereagh complimented his hon. friend on his steady perseverance in the great cause in which he had already so distinguished himself. He assured him that Ministers were fully disposed to second him, and had not slept at their posts. Entirely concurring with him, that till arrangements were formed for carrying into complete effect the abolition by all the powers of Europe, the measure would not be productive of that good which the humane policy of this country and the benevolent views of the other powers expected from it, Government was stimulated to every exertion for procuring the consent of the only two States that now exclusively conducted the traffic. Much had already been done by this country, much by Congress, and much by those two States themselves; but while one nation still disgraced its flag by carrying on so cruel a trade, the evils of the system would be partially increased, and rendered more cruel and atrocious by being combined with resistance and piracy. He would not at present enter into the subject; but he hoped that, by the beginning of next session, the negotiations now going on would be brought to such an issue as would enable him to lay them fully before the House. He flattered himself with the hope that the conclusion of them would be satisfactory; but if they should turn out to be otherwise, his honourable friend, who, he was convinced, would not relax in his vigilance, would again bring forward the subject. Even if Ministers should succeed in their endeavours to the full extent of their hopes, it might be proper at that time to inquire by a Committee into the whole question, and to take into view what had been done, and what still remained to be accomplished. Though, on account of what he had stated, he should abstain from farther discussion, he would not oppose the address of his honourable friend, because it expressed the sentiments of his Majesty's Government; and he should always esteem it a happy circumstance to have the concurrence of Parliament in the policy which they thought it their duty to pursue.

Mr. P. Moore said, though the evils of the slave trade were great and undeniable, and though he as heartily as any man wished to see them terminated, yet there was a drawback on the measure for carrying the abolition into effect. There had been a species of wholesale legislation on this subject, which had been productive of pernicious consequences. No control was established over those who seconded the zeal of the country in stopping this nefarious traffic; and the result was, that much individual oppression had been produced. He had presented a petition about three years ago from three individuals, complaining of abuse in the exercise of the powers intrusted to officers under the abolition acts. The substance of them was at first denied. It was needless to recapitulate the circumstances. Three persons established on the Rio Pongas had been dragged from their settlements to Sierra Leone, there tried by a surgeon, condemned to fourteen years' banishment in Botany Bay, and sent to Portsmouth, to be from thence transported. From that place they transmitted to him a petition, which he presented to the Prince Regent, through the noble Secretary for the Colonies, who had attended to it, and ordered the oppressed individuals to be liberated. One of them had since brought his action in the King's Bench, and recovered 1000*l.* damages for false imprisonment, and 19,000*l.* as compensation for the loss of property. These persons had not been concerned in the slave trade as was pretended. (Hear, hear, from Mr. Brougham.) If such practices were allowed, the evils resulting from the execution of the abolition act would only be equalled by the traffic it was intended to abolish. He had read of captures of slaves from slave-dealers, but what became of them? We heard of such captures in the Mauritius, and at Madagascar; but were these miserable objects released? He was afraid that subjects of our country disposed of them in Brazil, and on those coasts where they were taken, which they were enabled to do from a want of vigilance over their proceedings, and control over their conduct. Government did not take the proper steps to prevent slave-dealing, which occurred principally on the coasts, and which might therefore be stopped more easily by a few vessels in the nature of guarda costas, than by the measures usually adopted.

Mr. Brougham would not have obtruded himself at all on the attention of the House, and certainly not at this early stage of the debate, had it not been owing to the statement of his honourable friend (Mr. P. Moore), which, if it went forth to the country uncontradicted, might produce pernicious effects on the public mind. His honourable friend had launched a most extraordinary charge against all the abolitionists, and against himself as one of them, as dealing in wholesale legislation. He did not understand the meaning of this epithet, when applied to laws for carrying the abolition into effect. In all legislation, the remedy should be co-extensive with the evil to be prevented, or the dangers apprehended. The laws on this subject proceeded no farther; they described the offence, and prescribed the punishment of it wherever found. To limit the punishment to a particular place, when the offence might be general, might, to follow the figure of his honourable friend, be retail legislation; but it would be partial and inefficient. If he meant that such laws should be partial, there was, undoubtedly, some foundation for his charge of enacting wholesale measures. The law of the 51st of the King which he had the honour to introduce, had two objects in view: 1st, to prevent trading in slaves, by declaring the act a felony anywhere within the British dominions; and, 2dly, to prevent trading in slaves by British subjects anywhere, either in the British dominions or not. To apply this law to the case mentioned by his honourable friend, it happened that Cooke and his associates had been engaged in the slave-trade at Rio Pongas, which was beyond the limits of our colony of Sierra Leone. A military force was sent to observe their conduct, and to learn if they were British subjects, with instructions to apprehend them if they were. The information they received was, that they were British subjects; and this was not contradicted till after their apprehension. Cooke was tried at Sierra Leone, and the judge, as had been stated, happened to be a surgeon. It often must occur in the colonies that persons, professionally qualified for particular offices, could not be found when their services were required. Intervals would occur between the death of one judge and the arrival of another; and the public business could not stand still. The gentleman who presided on this occasion was a man of good education and respectable character; and there seemed nothing more incongruous in his fulfilling the office of judge, though not professionally qualified, than in the Duke of Manchester, as Governor of Jamaica, fulfilling that of Lord Chancellor, for which he was not educated. That noble duke had often delicate questions of property to decide in his capacity of Chancellor: and surely, a gentleman of good education could discharge a duty similar to that which every magistrate in the sessions, though not professionally brought up, was called to fulfil. Certain he was that, without much knowledge, this surgeon could perform the duty as well as the late chief justice, Dr. Thorpe, than whose proceedings he never saw any thing more irregular. Cooke was convicted of slave-dealing, and sentenced accordingly, as a British subject. He believed he did not plead guilty, but he admitted that he was a British subject. The defence that he was an American citizen was an afterthought, and did not occur to him till he arrived in England. It was well known by those who were acquainted with the proceedings of prize courts, that men frequently became Americans or English as best suited their purpose. Being therefore considered as a British subject, he was guilty of a felony under the act of the 51st of the King, though the slave-dealing was carried on beyond the limits of the British territory. He (Mr. B.) however admitted, that the Court had not jurisdiction. By an oversight in the act which he had brought in, it was founded on a statute of William, which had been repealed. Neither he nor any lawyer in Westminster-hall was aware that the statute of William had been repealed; nor was the circumstance known to Mr. Stephen, Master in Chancery, who knew more about the acts relative to colonies than all the lawyers in Westminster-hall put together. By this oversight the Court of Sierra Leone had not jurisdiction; though it was still made a question, whether or not the act of the 51st of the King did not call into existence so much of the repealed statute of William as it referred to; and which, by being revived, would give the former validity. On this ground, and on this ground alone, was Cooke released; a release to which he did not object, as, if there was any doubt, the accused should have the benefit of it. But no part of these proceedings could possibly prejudice the character of Colonel Maxwell; for, with the information which had been laid before him, he would not have been justified in abstaining from taking steps to bring the offenders to justice. The more this transaction was sifted, the more blameless and even praiseworthy would the conduct of that meritorious individual appear. When his hon. friend, therefore, boasted of the verdict which had been obtained in a recent trial, it might be proper to recollect, that the damages given were subject to a reference; that they were taken as stated in the declaration, and might be cut down to the lowest possible sum. With regard to that portion of the verdict which referred to the subject of imprisonment, and the amount of which was 1,000*l.* he deeply regretted the necessity which had occasioned it. He meant no reflection on the Court or Jury; a technical nicety had rendered it necessary that a verdict should pass against the defendant, but it could neither set up the character of Mr. Cooke nor degrade that of Colonel Maxwell. He could not avoid taking the present opportunity of expressing a confident hope, equal indeed to an expectation, that Government, under these circumstances, would not suffer him to go without compensation for the pecuniary loss which he had sustained. No one ever objected to the frequent indemnification of captors in prize cases, and no officer had more hardly earned an ample recompense than Colonel Maxwell. Having thus answered the sort of episode which had been introduced into the discussion by his hon. friend, he had now a very few observations to address to the principal matter under consideration. He certainly did not entertain the same sanguine hopes of inducing Spain and Portugal to abandon these detestable practices, which had been expressed by his hon. friend in the speech with which he prefaced the present motion, and by the noble lord in his explanation. If the effectual abolition of all these enormous evils was contemplated, there appeared to him to be but one method of accomplishing the object. The only means of ultimate success consisted, in his opinion, in the adoption of some arrangement among the greater powers of Europe, which should establish a mutual right of search. This was the only way of guarding against evasion, and defeating the sophistry of the doctors of Salamanca and Coimbra, in construing or expounding treaties. He considered that, although it might be regarded as introducing a new principle of national law, it was imperiously required by the importance and urgency of the case; and that, without such a regulation, there would be little security that Spain and Portugal would observe their public declarations, whilst there was still less that individuals would not evade them.

Mr. A. Broune thought it right to observe, that whatever progress had been made in carrying the abolition into effect, none of the difficulties which had been experienced were attributable to those who had originally opposed it. On the contrary, many of them, both at home and in the West Indies, had been earnest and active in their endeavours to assist the execution of the law. He had only to add, that he was not sanguine enough to expect any very favourable result from the negotiations which the address was intended to promote.

Mr. Goulburn expressed his satisfaction at hearing the accurate explanation made by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) relative to the circumstances of Governor Maxwell's conduct. He rose chiefly for the purpose of stating, that Government had already signified to that gentleman, that the whole of the expenses incurred on the late trial would be defrayed by the public.

Mr. Smyth concurred in opinion with the hon. and learned gentleman, that some international regulation could alone effectuate an entire abolition of the slave trade. If the noble lord, the proudest moment of whose life was when he procured from the principal Sovereigns of Europe, in the Congress at Vienna, a sentence of condemnation against this practice, should follow up that proceeding by some measure that might carry it into effect, the reputation of his name would be as lasting as the principles of humanity and justice.

Mr. Barham alluded to a charge against this country, which was sometimes gravely and sometimes sarcastically made by foreigners, and particularly by the French, of our being actuated by selfish motives in our exertions to procure an universal relinquishment of this trade; and of our having ceased to carry it on ourselves only when it was no longer necessary to our colonial interests. Bold as this accusation was, it was directly contrary to the fact; and it was rather singular, that, at this moment, the French West India colonies were more saturated with slaves than our own.

Mr. W. Smith expressed great doubts with regard to any influence which negotiation would enable us to exercise over the courts of Spain and Portugal upon this subject; and referred to an opinion of Dr. Franklin, that whenever their consent to a general abolition of the trade should become necessary, Spain, which deserved the least, would insist on the largest compensation.

Mr. Marryat was of opinion, that the suggestion of prohibiting the colonial produce of Spain and Portugal, would, if acted on, expose this country, which must be the greatest gainer by such a proceeding, to a still stronger suspicion of being actuated by selfish motives. He thought it important, that some alteration should be made in the instructions given to naval officers with regard to the capture of slave ships. A great number of these vessels had been condemned at Sierra Leone, and all the judgments, except three, had been reversed by the Court of Admiralty in this country. When the judgment was affirmed, the captors received 30*l.* or 40*l.* for each slave; but when restitution was decreed, the assessment was always made at the highest value, and not less than 75*l.* ordered to be paid to the parties appealing against the decision of the colonial court. This was a most extraordinary situation for us to be placed in; the original cost of a slave was about 5*l.* 10*s.* and the trader knew that if his vessel was condemned at Sierra Leone, he should obtain ample compensation in London. Was it possible to conceive a more powerful stimulus to the continuance and extension of the trade? The first step for the purpose of applying a remedy to this evil was, in his opinion, to render the instructions issued to naval officers more consonant to the decisions of the Court of Admiralty. He was happy in giving his support to the address, and in expressing his hope that a termination of this dreadful traffic was not very far distant.

The address was then agreed to*.

FINANCES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.] Mr. Tierney rose to call the attention of the House to the present amount of the unfunded public debt, and the actual income of the country. He observed, that he had already submitted certain resolutions on this subject, which he now wished to withdraw, as he found that he had committed a very considerable mistake. The state of his health had indeed prevented him from entering into that minute investigation which could alone guard against error in researches of this nature. At the same time he might add, that in substituting other resolutions, there would be but a slight difference in the general result of his calculations.—He had before stated, that the amount of the unfunded debt of Great Britain and Ireland, (exclusive of any deficiency in the Income of and charge upon the Consolidated Fund) to be provided for on the 5th January 1818, would be 70,267,192*l.* At that time, he was not aware that Irish Treasury Bills, amounting to 4,220,000*l.* had been paid off in the present year. He now assumed, that the amount of unfunded debt unprovided for on the 5th January 1818, would be 66,047,192*l.* The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Grant) had stated in his resolutions, that the amount of Exchequer Bills and of Irish Treasury Bills, granted in the present or former Session, which would be outstanding on the 5th of January 1818, would be 64,684,992*l.* This calculation, he apprehended, proceeded on the supposition, that the new issues of Exchequer Bills would be strictly applied to pay off those outstanding: and if this were taken for granted, then the whole difference between the hon. gentleman and himself was a sum of 1,362,200*l.* upon the whole amount of the unfunded debt.—The next resolution that he meant to propose related to the Navy debt. The hon. gentleman had estimated the sum to be expended by the Commissioners for the redemption of the funded debt of Great Britain and Ireland, in the year 1817, at 16,124,443*l.*; he (Mr. T.) in his former resolutions had calculated it at 16,175,080*l.*: but it was important to observe, that this included a sum of 1,660,000*l.* for paying off Navy and Transport debt. Now, this was a debt which he considered to be a sort of running account between Government and the persons employed in that branch of the public service, and which was subject to increase from time to time. He wished to know, therefore, whether the 1,660,000*l.* was a final extinction of so much debt, or whether the account was not still open? His whole object, in framing these resolutions, was, to condense the subject of Finance into a few clear points, so as to make it intelligible to the country at large; for, whatever might be the knowledge possessed of it in that House, it was not understood out of doors by one person in ten. It was no answer to him to say, that he had made no discoveries, since his very errors drew an explanation from the other side. The unfunded debt was a complete mystery to the great mass of the country till lately; and he could not but express his surprise that the Finance Committee should have directed no part of its labours towards affording some information upon the state of the funded and unfunded debt.—His third resolution related to the arrears of Property Tax, which formed one of the Ways and Means of meeting the supplies. This point ought to be clearly understood. When the public saw a balance on the face of the Budget, they concluded, that this was created upon the revenue and supplies of the year; whilst the fact was, that of a charge of

22,141,537*l.*, the annual revenue produced only 5,165,000*l.* The arrears of Property Tax, namely, 1,023,000*l.* forming part of the surplus of the Consolidated Fund on the 5th of April 1817, and 1,500,000*l.*, received, or to be received, between the 5th of April 1817, and the 5th of April 1818, were to be reckoned among the extraordinary receipts, and could not occur again. In the Report of the Committee of Finance, it was stated, that the arrears of the Property Tax would be necessary to make the revenue equal to the expenditure for this and the following year. What the Committee meant by this, he did not know, for the arrears of Property Tax were in the nature of assets, not of annual revenue. It was material, therefore, to have a resolution on this point.—His fourth resolution was, that, supposing the income of, and charge upon, the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland to be the same in the year ending on the 5th of January 1818, as in the year ending on the 5th of January 1817, there would be an excess of charge amounting to 3,575,210*l.* If he was wrong in this statement, he was open to correction, and he desired nothing except that the public should be made acquainted with the truth. The Committee were of opinion, that a fair estimate of the future state of our Finances might be formed upon a comparison of the years 1815 and 1816, the former of which was an abundant, and the latter a deficient year. He was quite satisfied, however, that it was vain to expect that the revenue could be kept up in time of peace to the point which it had reached during the latter years of the war, when we possessed the trade of the whole world. It would be impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to keep up the taxes: the distresses of the country were such that the people could not pay them.—He had one more resolution to submit, which was explanatory of the fourth; but before he moved this, he must observe, that it was rather odd now, in the month of July, to be talking of estimates. It was to him unaccountable how this had happened, as the Report contained nothing which could not have been stated with as much ease in March. It had been delayed to such a very late period because the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that the 5th of April had not arrived, and the accounts could not be made up before that time; but let the House look into that Report, and they would not find the 5th of April mentioned in it. (Hear, hear.) His last resolution went to state, that the surplus of the Consolidated Fund, in the quarter ending the 5th of April 1817, had been voted as a part of the Ways and Means of the year; so that there remained only three quarters up to the 5th of January 1818. Now the deficiency of the income of the Consolidated Fund to meet the charge in the quarter ending on the 5th of July 1817 (supposing the surplus of the Consolidated Fund in Ireland to be the same as on the 5th of April) was 3,273,827*l.* If the revenue, then, did not equal the payment of the national debt, what could we think of so dark a prospect? He did not say that the creditors of the nation were by any means in danger, nor did he wish to give a more gloomy view of the situation of the country than was borne out by facts; but there was, without doubt, a considerable sum deficient to enable the Bank to pay their dividends. The right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had talked of a temporary distress; but there never had been so long a temporary distress, and, what was most alarming, it was every day getting worse and worse. The presumption was, and that, too, even on the shewing of the Finance Committee, that there would not be enough to pay the national debt without borrowing, and he could not but regard it as most unfortunate, that Parliament should now separate without making any provision for that purpose, as it was obvious something ought to have been done.—He had now gone through the several points which his resolutions embraced, and if he had committed any mistakes, they would be corrected by the opposite side. He rejoiced to see the hon. gentleman (Mr. C. Grant) coming forward with his talents on subjects of this nature. He was happy to have been the means of calling forth the abilities of that hon. gentleman, and he trusted that he would continue to devote his attention to such important questions. He (Mr. Tierney) believed, that no country ever was in the state in which this country now was. The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought the system of exchequer bills better than funding; but he (Mr. T.) should have funded to a small amount this year. We must consider how much of these exchequer bills could be borne by the market. What was the amount of the exchequer bills which the Bank purchased? Without we knew this, we could not tell what the state of the market was. Next year, the 6,000,000*l.* advanced by the Bank, and the 3,000,000*l.* must undergo some new arrangement. There must be in the next year a great trial of strength on this subject. The right hon. gentleman had said, that the Bank were to resume their payments in cash; but would they resume their payments in cash, and take the same quantity of exchequer bills which they now did? Three months ago we had heard of nothing but distress; every one wished to borrow, and no one was able to lend. Now it turned out that there was so great a surplus capital that no man knew what to do with it. This must arise from the stagnation of trade. What were the Bank to do, if that money which used to be applied in discount now remained on their hands? They must purchase exchequer bills with it: but could this be quoted as a proof of the prosperity of the country? Bankers, he heard, were now buying into the stocks: this, however, might prove to be a fatal speculation. They were playing with their customers' money, he would not say in a very unjustifiable, but certainly in a very unusual way. Every banker in the city had thus become a Bull. Such a state of things could not go on. He could not understand how the rising of the stocks was any criterion of an improvement in our circumstances. Suppose trade revived in a very great degree, large amounts must be sold out of the stocks. The banker held capital belonging to the merchants, which was invested in the stocks: but it must be sold out, if trade revived, and that at whatever happened to be the price of the day. He never could get any gentleman to tell him what was meant by plenty of money, and what by a scarcity. One day we found plenty of money, and on the next we were told there was nothing. Some gentlemen might be able to explain this, but to him it was quite unintelligible. As a proof, however, of the great capital now unemployed, the Regent's Canal Company, with all this apparent prosperity in the country, had found it necessary to come to Parliament, like beggars, to borrow money? His firm conviction was, that things would get better, and materially (hear, hear, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer); the harvest, he hoped, would do a great deal, but this was a slow operation. A length of time had elapsed before the mischiefs which took place a year and a half ago had been felt in the revenue; and, therefore, if the revenue could not be raised, and very considerably raised, this country would be involved in greater difficulties than it had ever before experienced. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests wanted to borrow 300,000*l*. Did any man think that they would be able to raise that money without having recourse to the stocks? He believed that in the way we were now going on, at the end of five years—and if we got five or six years of peace in the present state of the world, God knows, it was as much as any man ought to calculate upon—our situation would be truly alarming. Nobody could say that the country could revive in trade and commerce with such a heavy load of taxes as now existed. All these were things which he had thrown out very crudely, but he trusted they would have their weight with the House, and deserve the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There were several points connected with the trade of the country which he could have wished to mention, but neither his health nor his spirits would allow him to enter into any details on that subject. The right hon. gentleman concluded with moving that his first resolutions be withdrawn. They were read pro forma, and withdrawn accordingly. He then moved the following resolutions:—

I.

That the Unfunded Debt of Great Britain and Ireland, in Exchequer and Treasury Bills unprovided for, may be stated as follows: viz.

Exchequer Bills outstanding and unprovided for 24th June 1817.....	£52,362,300
Treasury Bills (Ireland) Do. Do.....	1,084,992
Further Exchequer Bills voted for the service of 1817.....	9,000,000
Further Treasury Bills (Ireland) Do. Do.	3,600,000

Probable amount of Unfunded Debt unprovided for 5th January, 1818	66,047,192
That the amount of Exchequer Bills outstanding was 5th January, 1817. £44,463,300
And of Treasury Bills (Ireland) Do.	5,304,992
Unfunded Debt outstanding and unprovided for 5th January, 1817.....	49,768,292
Leaving a probable increase of Unfunded Debt unprovided for 5th Jan. 1818.	16,278,900
And that deducting the sum to be expended by the Commissioners for the Redemption of the Funded Debt of Great Britain and Ireland in the year 1817, which may be estimated at ..	14,464,443
The probable increase of Debt in Exchequer and Treasury Bills, exclusive of any excess of charge upon the Consolidated Fund beyond the income thereof will be.....	1,814,457

II.

That Provision has been made for paying off Navy Debt, outstanding on the 5th of Jan. 1817, to the amount of..	1,660,000

III.

That towards raising the Supplies for the year, extraordinary receipts from arrears of Property Tax have been applied as follows: viz.
£1,023,000 forming part of the Surplus of the Consolidated Fund, on the 5th of April, 1817, voted as Ways and Means of the year.....	1,023,000
£1,500,000 received, or to be received, between the 5th of April, 1817, and the 5th of April, 1818.....	1,500,000

IV.

That supposing the Income of, and Charge upon, the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland to be the same in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1818, as in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1817, they may be stated as follows, viz.
INCOME: Great Britain (after deducting 374,000 l . Arrears of Property Tax).....	38,709,351
Ditto, Ireland.....	4,394,631
Income of year ending 5th January, 1818.....	43,104,182
CHARGE: Great Britain.....£39,693,429
Ditto, Ireland.....	6,985,963
Charge of year ending 5th January, 1818.....	46,679,392

V.

That the Surplus of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, in the Quarter ending the 5th of April,

1817, has been voted as a part of the Ways and Means of the year : And that the Deficiency of the Income of the Consolidated Fund to meet the Charge in the Quarter ending the 5th July, 1817, (supposing the Surplus of the Consolidated Fund in Ireland to be the same as on the 5th of April) is 3,273,800

Mr. C. Grant, junr. rose.—He commenced with requesting the right hon. gentleman to accept of his warmest thanks for the very flattering terms, and the handsome manner, in which he had been pleased to speak of him. He should not detain the House by going fully into the question, but merely state the points on which he differed from the right hon. gentleman, and shew the grounds which had induced him to bring forward the resolutions which he should have the honour to propose. The resolutions of the right hon. gentleman might be divided into two parts: the one relating to the amount of the unfunded debt; the other to the income and revenue of the country. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that the probable amount of Exchequer Bills, and Irish Treasury Bills, unprovided for on the 5th of Jan. 1818, would be 66,047,192*l.*; while he, on the contrary, maintained that it would not exceed 64,684,992*l.* The right hon. gentleman had also said, that the probable increase of debt in Exchequer and Treasury Bills, exclusive of any excess of charge upon the Consolidated Fund beyond the income thereof, would be 1,814,457*l.* On the other hand, he (Mr. G.) contended, that, instead of an increase, there would be a diminution of debt, to the amount of 1,207,743*l.* The right hon. gentleman, perhaps, assumed that there would be a deficiency in the Ways and Means; but it was very unlikely that any deficiency should occur, as they had all been realized, or nearly so. It was impossible that the utmost amount of Exchequer Bills could exceed, on the 5th of Jan. 1818, the sum, which he had specified; and he was not aware that they would reach that amount. Taking it, however, for granted, that the whole would be then outstanding, the account would be found to stand thus, namely, Exchequer Bills, 60,000,000*l.*, Irish Treasury Bills, 4,684,992*l.*, making a total, as he had said before, of 64,684,992*l.* The right hon. gentleman's mistake arose in this manner:—he had computed the same sum twice. In his former resolutions, he had put down the Irish Treasury Bills at 5,304,992*l.*; but he had since discovered that 4,220,000*l.* had been paid off; and, therefore, he had very properly reduced the item to 1,084,992*l.* But the right hon. gentleman had fallen into a similar error, in the resolutions now before them. The amount of Exchequer Bills outstanding on the 5th of January, 1817, was 44,463,300*l.*, and up to the 24th of June, 52,862,300*l.* To these, the right hon. gentleman had added the 12,000,000*l.* in the budget; but the fact was, that the latter went as a sub-tution for such part of the 52,862,200*l.*, as had been applied to the services of the year. He was surprised that, in drawing up the resolutions, it did not strike the right hon. gentleman that there was some mistake, when he saw by the First Report, how much had been appropriated since the beginning of the year, to meet the supply for the unfunded debt then unprovided for. If he had been able to make himself understood so far, he hoped he should also be able to explain the remainder of his statement. If the utmost amount of Exchequer Bills which could be outstanding on the 5th of Jan. 1818, (should the whole of the supplies of the current year be then issued) would be no more than 64,684,992*l.*, then the increase of unfunded debt unprovided for, would be no more than 14,916,700*l.*, which would be met by a sum of 16,124,443*l.*, to be applied in the course of the year to the reduction of the funded and unfunded debt; so that on the face of the whole finances, there appeared a reduction of debt to the amount of 1,207,743*l.* So far as his resolutions, then, went, he conceived he might stop there; but in taking the liberty of moving the previous question, he should contend that the merit of these resolutions was, that they consisted of matters of fact and calculation, and not of hypothesis, conjecture, or prediction.—His objection to the resolutions of the right hon. gentleman was, that they contained much matter of argument, inference, or deduction. He did not mean to say that argument, or inference, was never to be made use of on this subject; but he objected to the bringing forward such statements in the shape of resolutions, in which the whole of a subject could not be seen. He regretted that the right hon. gentleman had not multiplied his resolutions, because he wished to see the whole subject better placed before the House, although it would not in this shape have facilitated the answer: for if the right hon. gentleman had multiplied such argumentative resolutions, he (Mr. G.) must have multiplied his in return, and that only in a way to have added to the quantity of argument and deduction. If a stranger were to have such resolutions placed in his hand, it would be impossible that he could form any opinion as to the future finances of the country. He therefore objected to them, because they were framed on inadequate premises, and led to erroneous conclusions. The right hon. gentleman had dwelt upon the amount of the arrears of the Property Tax, which had fallen in this year, which he had called an extraordinary source of supply that would not again recur; but he had omitted to notice, on the other hand, some extraordinary charges, especially with respect to Ireland and the Navy debt, which could not occur next year. In the fourth resolution, he had estimated the charge too high, in supposing it to be precisely the same this year as in the last; it was much more probable that it would be considerably reduced. After animadverting farther upon the fallacious data which formed the ground-work of the right hon. gentleman's resolutions, and the erroneous conclusions which he had built upon them, the hon. member referred to the consolatory prospects held out by the improvement of the country, and concluded with moving the previous question.

Mr. Tierney, in explanation, maintained, that if the revenue of the present year were equal only to that of the last, and that equality he was entitled to assume from the receipts up to July, the consequences must be such as he had stated*.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it would be unnecessary for him to trouble the House with a repetition of the arguments which had been adduced by his hon. friend, especially as the right hon. gentleman opposite seemed to admit the grounds of his honourable friend's resolutions, except as to about 500,000*l.* Exchequer Bills; with regard to which he had contended, that before those bills were issued, the old ones should have been discharged; but any gentleman who had attended to circumstances of notorious fact, very well knew that the amount of Exchequer Bills newly required, was not that which the right hon. gentleman had mentioned, and that the bills issued this year paid for those which had been in circulation during last year. From the present great demand for Exchequer Bills, he had already been enabled to discharge all that had been in circulation up to October last; and, however ludicrous it might sound, it was much more likely that there would be a scarcity of Exchequer Bills, than that there would be any difficulty in disposing of them. (A laugh.) If the taxes that had been proposed last year had been maintained, there would have been no question now, whether the balance of accounts was or was not in favour of the public. He expected an improvement in the state of our finances, but if by any unfortunate or unforeseen event, his hopes should be frustrated, it would be the duty of Parliament to supply the proper remedy.—That public credit had been greatly improved, was a fact which the right hon. gentleman could not disguise, although he had thought it surprising and even unnatural. He did not view the matter in that light; and thought he could account for it. Before the close of last year, there had been a great accumulation of mercantile capital, but the funded debt of the country did not improve in the same degree as the capital of individuals; and it may be said, that the violent suggestions, the wild and mischievous schemes, which had been thrown out both within and without the walls of the House, some of them going directly to attack the property of the fundholder, he could not wonder that at that time public confidence should have sustained some depression. Happily no such ideas had been held out in the present session. Parliament had carefully and resolutely abstained from any measure that was likely to affect public credit. In a time of great discontent and distress, it had forbore to meddle with or alter the corn laws; for whatever might be said, he was convinced that nothing had done so much injury on former occasions, as that shifting and varying system which had been from time to time pursued, previously to the adoption of the last measure on that subject. The circumstances of the country having generally improved, public credit had also increased; inasmuch, that Exchequer Bills now only paid an interest of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent*. The prospect of a speedy resumption of cash payments by the Bank, had also contributed to improve public credit. He believed that nothing but some extraordinary political shock could now interfere to prevent the resumption of these payments. (Hear, hear.) A beneficial influence had been also produced by the diminution of our debt, and the issue of the new silver coinage. These were the effects of the first year of settled peace, and he hoped that the next year would be productive of results still more important. If, as Providence seemed now to promise, we should be blessed with an abundant harvest, we might next year look to an increase of prosperity, and an extension of commercial intercourse with the rest of the world. It had been most unjustly charged on this country, that she had ever risen on the ruin of others. (Hear, hear.) But the fact was, that we must rise on the prospect of other countries, and they on ours. (Hear, hear.) We certainly had our difficulties to contend with; but we were still capable of making great exertions. He hoped such exertions would not be called for; but if they should, he depended on that firmness and vigour in Parliament, of which they had given such an example in the present session.

Sir H. Parnell said, he was surprised to hear the right hon. gent. ascribe the distressed state of the finances to the rejection of the Property tax. If the subject were sifted, our embarrassment would be found to have no other cause than the wasteful prodigality of the last twenty years. The right hon. gentleman was always ready with vigorous measures, as he called them, but every body knew what was meant by his vigorous measures; the only vigour of which he and his colleagues had any conception, was the vigour of new and increased taxation. (Hear. They ought to be vigorous in enforcing and giving an example of the most severe economy (hear.) but, instead of this, they tied us to an expenditure of 17,000,000*l.*, for a peace establishment. Why had not they got rid of those offices in Ireland, which the Union had rendered quite useless? They still kept up there a secretary for the war department, a secretary for military accounts, an adjutant-general, and commissary-general, whose services were wholly superfluous. He hoped this subject would secure more attention in the next session, and that the country would take steps in time to repel the system of vigour, with which it was threatened by the right hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.)

* An official return has been just made of the produce of the Revenue, in the quarter, ending the 10th of October, 1817, by which it appears, that there is an excess in the receipts of that quarter, above those of the corresponding quarter last year. There is a great deficiency in the Excise, but an increase in the Customs. In the Stamps, there is an increase of 200,000*l.*; in the Assessed Taxes, an increase of nearly 70,000*l.*; in the Land Tax and Miscellaneous Taxes, there is also an increase. In the Post Office, there is a deficiency of 11,000*l.* The total increase of the quarter is nearly 100,000*l.* (See the Abstract of the Net Produce of the Revenue, Appendix xvii.)

Mr. W. Smith rose to answer some observations in which he felt he had been alluded to. The Chancellor of the Exchequer called that wild and mischievous which he had himself adopted; because, by borrowing this year to pay off the debt, he only added to the burden of the country. Thus, if a man borrowed 100*l.* to pay off 100*l.* which he had borrowed in the preceding year, all he could get by the operation would be the expense of borrowing; and his affairs would, in fact, be every year growing worse, by the amount at least of the stamp on the notes, and the stamp on the receipt. That was the case now with the right hon. gentleman's operations of finance. All the eloquence in the world could not disprove this plain fact, that though 16,124,449*l.* were to be applied this year, nominally, to the reduction of the debt, no more than 1,207,749*l.* would be actually paid off, while 14,916,700*l.* would be taken from the sinking fund. The hon. gentleman must, therefore, excuse him if he said, that the epithets, vile and mischievous, did not apply to what had fallen from him. The real question was, what advantage had been gained. He did not deny that raising money on Exchequer bills at less than 5 per cent., was a great advantage; but he did not think that much benefit would result from it, if the operation had the effect of materially raising the price of the funds. Suppose the three per cents were at 65, the sum of 150,000*l.*, applied four times a week, by the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, would purchase 180,000*l.*; but the same sum laid out when the stocks were at 75, would purchase only 160,000*l.*; that is, 20,000*l.* less, four times a week all the year round, which would amount to a loss of five millions in the course of the year. So that if the high price of the funds was caused in any degree, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asserted, by the issue of Exchequer bills at 3*l.* per cent., as much was lost by the commissioners for the redemption of the national debt, by the rise in the funds at the time of their purchase, as was gained by the Chancellor under the low rate of interest payable on his Exchequer bills. He agreed, that it was better to borrow money this year by Exchequer bills, than to raise it by taxes; but this was only putting off the evil day; and he repeated, that it was by the application of the Sinking Fund to the purposes of the year, and by no other means, that the right hon. gentleman would be able to avoid his difficulties. At all events, he sincerely hoped never to see the Income tax revived.

Mr. Grenfell, under all the circumstances of the case, approved of the plan of the right hon. gentleman. He believed that the resources of the country would ultimately be found sufficient for its exigencies. The people had a right to demand that, as long as we remained at peace, no attempt should be made to impose on them any additional taxes, and, in his opinion, any such attempt would be impracticable. After some remarks on the operation of the Sinking Fund, in the course of which he deprecated the plan of creating debt with one hand, for the purpose of diminishing it with the other, he concluded with denying that he had ever expressed any disbelief of the capability of the Bank to resume cash payments; but had only said, that what the right hon. gentleman had called a virtual resumption of cash payments was, in fact, no payment at all.

Mr. Baring contended, that for all practical purposes, the Sinking Fund was completely swept away, and that at present it was a mere delusion. He thought the country was highly indebted to his right hon. friend, (Mr. Tierney), for affording every man the means of making himself acquainted with the real state of the finances. It appeared to him that the receipts would meet the expenses, or at any rate that there would not be above half a million either on one side or the other. He commented on the necessity of keeping inviolate the public credit, which was not to be played tricks with, as had been the case in other countries. He was surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman so often express his regrets at the loss of the Property tax: the House had judged rightly in getting rid of it, he hoped for ever. Alluding to the duties from the Customs and Excise, he thought it utterly impossible to maintain the high duties on many of the articles. He went into a detail of the facility with which smuggling is carried on between this country and Flanders, where tea, which sells in London for 8*s.* per lb., is procured for 2*s.* 6*d.* On the point of the peace establishment, he thought if the House had done its duty, it would have been brought down to the present sum of 17,200,000*l.* at once, instead of being kept at 22,000,000*l.* till this year. He had strong hopes, that when political disputes, connected with Ireland, were at an end, and should no longer be made use of as a ladder to political power, (hear, hear.) we might look to that country as affording the means of greatly increasing our financial resources. He was convinced that the general trade of this country was reviving; and that although it would never return to the unnatural state in which it existed during a great period of the war, it was rapidly approaching to a sound and healthy condition, which was much to be preferred.

Mr. Huskisson observed, that, with respect to the assertion that the revenue of the country was not at present more than equal to the charges, the same had always been the case at the conclusion of a peace. In 1786, there was a deficiency in the receipts, as compared with the expenditure, of 4,884,000*l.* What did Mr. Pitt do that year? Precisely what his right hon. friend had done this year. He added no less than 5,500,000*l.* to the unfunded debt, by the issue of Exchequer Bills to cover the existing deficiency. He (Mr. H.) took the main causes of our present difficulties—he meant the remote and predisposing causes—to be of a complicated nature, partly political, and partly financial. During the war a very extraordinary excitement was given to our agriculture and trade, and above all to our foreign trade. It was impossible, too, to forget the state of the currency during the war, and the unbounded facility which speculators found in the unlimited issues of paper, and the state of the country banks. This facility of speculation, coupled with other causes, led to overtrading, which again led to our present difficulties. The immediate cause of these difficulties, was the transition from a state of war to a state of peace, coupled as this was with some circumstances peculiar to the character of the late war. It had always happened to this country on a transition from a state of war to a state of peace, whether that war was calamitous in its result, as the American war had been, or fortunate in its issue, like the present war, that the active classes of the country were placed by the peace in a state of great embarrassment—that trade was in a most distressed condition, and that the industry of the country was paralysed. If the state of the country, at the end of every former war, had been the same in this respect as it was at the termination of the present, there must be some general cause in operation to produce this effect. It was obvious that a number of channels of industry on the breaking out of war were interrupted, and the industry turned into other channels arising out of the war. Again, on the return of peace, the industry to which the war peculiarly gave rise was suddenly stopped. The present war, too, terminated more suddenly than any former war. It also happened, that about the close of the war, a considerable importation of foreign corn had been followed by a very abundant harvest. It was well known that the greatest exertions were made at the close of the last war. The productive powers of the agriculture and industry of the country had received the greatest encouragement from the increase of prices which had been going on during the war. This made the distress produced by the cessation of the immense demand occasioned by the war, be more felt than it otherwise would have been. But what had been the effect of the war on the currency of the country? During the war a facility had been given to speculation by country banks. The country bankers were tempted to give not only large credit to others, but to embark in extensive speculations themselves, by seeing prices rise from day to day. The borrower was tempted to borrow, by seeing the value of what he borrowed diminished from day to day by the increase in price; and the lender was tempted to lend, by finding in this rise of price an additional security for his money. But when the fall in price took place, the creditor had no longer the same security; and a fall in price always diminished the demand, for no man wished to add to his stock in a falling market. Such was the situation of the country from these causes, that all last year, and in the beginning of the present, it was impossible, out of London, at least, to procure money at the legal interest. It was unnecessary to enlarge on the effects of this on a nation like England, with its poor laws, and its numerous burthens, all sustained by the activity of the country. When prices were continually rising, all the active classes were benefited, and annuitants alone were placed in a worse situation. But it was better that any loss should fall upon them than on the productive classes. The effect of a rise in price on them would perhaps force them to greater economy, and at most abridge their comforts; but while they were reduced to this, the other classes were benefited. But the effect of a falling market on the industry of the country was very different. If the value of a man's stock were only reduced 1-10th in value, perhaps that 1-10th might amount to the whole of his own capital, the other 9-10ths might be borrowed. The fall naturally alarmed the creditor, who, by urging his demand, forced sales by which the difficulty was increased. In such a state of things, it was impossible that the revenue, depending, as it did, so much on the active classes, should not fail. This re-action, produced by a return from war to peace, and the cessation of the war expenditure, had been immediately followed up by an aggravation of the difficulties of the country in the calamity of a deficient harvest. The peace had sent into the market 500,000 persons, who, from being consumers, became competitors for production. All these causes had produced the effects which they all had witnessed, but for which it was impossible there could be any immediate remedy. We had found ourselves, during the greatest part of this year, in the utmost distress from these circumstances. The only articles above value were money for production, and bread for the active part of the population; and nothing could be so distressing to a country as a scarcity in these, and a glut in all other articles. This was the situation of the country, particularly since the failure of the last harvest. His only surprise, indeed, was, that the revenue had not fallen off more. A falling off of 10 per cent. on a revenue of 50 millions was not so wonderful. When a scarcity of provisions happened to take place, when there was full employment for the people, the revenue was not affected. What would be the effect of this stagnation in our manufactures? It happened at present, that while the consumption was not diminished, the supply of all those who furnished goods to the country was diminished. But if consumption went on at the same rate, and the supplies diminished, the effect would be, that the stocks would be exhausted, prices would necessarily rise; and then when prices rose, a demand for labour would take place, and confidence and credit return. It was impossible that credit could improve but with an increased demand, and to this increased demand, in the nature of things, we might confidently look. And if there should be, as he trusted there would, not only in this country, but in all Europe, an abundant harvest, (for it was a singular misfortune, that last year the harvest was not only bad in this country, but in all Europe,) it was impossible but that the situation of the country and its revenue must improve. In another session, too, they would enter into a consideration of the state of our currency and of the country banks; not, he trusted, with a view to check issues or credit, but to place them on a more secure footing than they been on during the war. He would assert, that we were approaching to a state of confidence and credit, and that the industry of the country was reviving. Of this sufficient evidence had been laid before the Committee. It was proved that the leading branches of our manufactures were improving; and, in the very nature of things, this must take place. His right hon. friend could not suppose that the active classes in this country could remain for ever without employment, and that the whole of our immense capitals would lie dormant. He thought, therefore, that gloomy views of the situation of the country ought not to be entertained. He should rather think, after the exertions of the war, we might look forward confidently to a state of still greater prosperity than that which existed prior to the late reaction. Our situation must be one of progressive improvement, if we followed those principles which sound policy, as well as our duty, pointed out to us. It must be our policy, to cherish and preserve the peace of Europe. We were approaching to a state of healthy circulation, and he trusted that with regard to this point in future we should not depart from sound principles. During war public faith had been kept, and he trusted that in peace we should not abandon that honourable course. He trusted also that every means of practical economy would be resorted to, and that the House, not merely in their collective capacity, but individually, would do everything to prepare the country for the reception of more liberal commercial arrangements, which would have the effect of disarming foreign countries of their jealousy towards us.

The resolutions of Mr. Tierney were then successively proposed, and met by the previous

I.

That the total amount of the Funded Debt of the United Kingdom, unredeemed, was, on the 1st of Feb. 1816.	£810,046,036

SLAVES.] Sir S. Romilly moved an address for "copies of the Presentment of the Grand Jury of the island of Dominica in Feb. last, and of the Bills of indictment referred to in that Presentment." Three cases of wanton cruelty to slaves had been laid before the grand jury, in one of which a pregnant female had had her arm broken; and yet those whose duty it was to find the bills had thrown them out, adding a clause to their presentment, that "extremely dangerous consequences might result from the number of indictments for unmerited punishment to slaves brought before them, and supported by no evidence." So untrue was this assertion, that upon one of the cases ten of the grand jury had been in favour of the bill; and upon all, the Attorney-general of the island had seen sufficient cause to prepare and present the bills. The hon. and learned member pressed upon the House the necessity of interposing in cases like the present, or those laws for the protection of slaves which appeared the best upon paper, would be the worst in practice.

The address was agreed to. [On the 11th the Return was made, and ordered to be printed.]

Thursday, July 10.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The Royal assent was given by commission to the Exchequer-offices' Regulation Bill, the Clergy Residence Bill, the Game Preservation Bill, the Small Rents Bill, the Small Living Land-Tax Bill, and the Naval and Military Officers' Oaths Bill*.

* It will be seen, that this Bill passed through both Houses in the space of eight days. Lord Melville gave notice of his intention to introduce it on the 26th of June; on the 27th he introduced it accordingly; it was read a second time on the 30th June, was committed on the 1st of July, and read a third time on the 2d July, and sent to the Commons. On the same day, on the motion of Mr. Croker, it was read a first time in the Commons, a second time on the 3d July, and was committed and passed on the 4th July. In the Lords, it passed without a single observation, except the question put by the Bishop of Peterborough, (see page 1659.) and no notice whatever was taken of it in its passage through the Commons. This act allows the Executive Government to admit Roman Catholics freely into the navy and army, as officers, without tendering to them the oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, which oaths, however, it appears, practically never were tendered, though that matter was overlooked in the various struggles which have taken place for their repeal. But, according to the tenor and spirit of this act, Catholic Emancipation is now conceded as to naval and military service. It is in these words:—"Whereas by certain acts passed in the reigns of his Majesty's royal predecessors, it was provided, that officers in his Majesty's royal navy and officers in his Majesty's army shall take certain oaths, and make and subscribe certain declarations, before they shall enter upon the offices or places of trust to which they may be appointed: And whereas doubts have been entertained whether the provisions of the said acts are still POOR LAWS.] The Earl of Hardwicke presented a report from the Committee which had been appointed to consider the state of the Poor Laws.

The Earl of Liverpool could not allow the occasion to pass without saying, that no examination had ever been conducted with more candour and liberality, or with a stronger disposition to attend to every view in which the subject could be represented. The reports of this and the other House contained a great body of most important evidence; and much good might be done by their lordships during the recess, by collecting in their several counties all the information that could be procured on this interesting subject.

FRAME BREAKING BILL.] Lord Sidmouth moved the third reading of the Frame Breaking Bill. He observed, that as soon as this bill passed, it was the intention of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to issue a proclamation, offering an amnesty to such persons as had been engaged in these practices, with the exception of those concerned in an act of this kind perpetrated in the course of last summer at Loughborough, which had been accompanied with an attempt to commit murder.

The Marquis of Lansdowne observed, that resolutions had been agreed to in March last by in force in that behalf: And whereas the practice of taking the said oaths, and making and subscribing the said declarations, by officers previous to their receiving commissions in his Majesty's army, hath been long disused: And whereas it is expedient to remove such doubts, and to assimilate the practice of the two services: Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act, it shall and may be lawful to and for his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral aforesaid, the Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Land Forces, the Master General of the Ordnance, and the Secretary of War for the time being, respectively, or any other persons thereunto lawfully authorized, to deliver commissions or warrants to any officer or officers in his Majesty's royal navy, land forces, or royal marines, without previously requiring such officer or officers to take the said oaths, or make and subscribe the said declarations; any thing in any act or acts contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.

"II. Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any oaths required by any act or acts now in force to be taken, or to any declarations thereby required to be made and subscribed, by such officer or officers as aforesaid, after he or they shall have accepted and received such commissions or warrants as aforesaid."

After these officers have entered the service, all further obligation of taking the oaths is done away by the annual Act of Indemnity which is passed at the beginning of each session.

the grand juries in Leicester, Derby, and Nottingham, stating, that it was expedient, and even necessary, that this measure should be renewed; and yet no attention was paid to their recommendation till the very close of the session, when it was impossible that a matter of such importance could be fully and properly considered. Still, under all the circumstances, he must assent to the bill, though he did so with a protestation against the practice of bringing into that House measures of the highest importance at so late a period of the session.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

SLAVE TRADE.] Lord Grenville, said, he rose to call the attention of their lordships to a subject of as high importance as could at any time be brought before them. He was aware of the impropriety of introducing business of consequence into the House at the very conclusion of the session, when it was impossible to give it the consideration which it might deserve, but, as to this particular subject, there was peculiar propriety in the time at which it was submitted. It was proper to wait to see what would be the result of the course which the Executive Government was pursuing for the entire abolition of the Slave trade; but having waited till the very conclusion of the session, their lordships would ill indeed discharge their duty if they were to separate without addressing the Prince Regent, to express their deep regret at the degree in which those measures had proved ineffectual. In the course of the debates on this detestable traffic, it had been argued, that though this country were to abolish it, other countries would continue it; and that while Great Britain would lose a valuable branch of commerce, nothing would really be done towards the abolition of the trade. To that argument, he for one had answered, that if not one human being less were to be torn from his home and country, and exposed to all the horrors of the middle passage; if not one drop of blood less were to be shed in this commerce of cruelty, it was the duty of Great Britain to wash from itself the stain of this execrable trade, and to provide that in future, at least, this guilt should not rest with us, and that this blood should not be required at our hands. But another consideration of the greatest weight was then stated. It had been contended by those who supported the abolition, that it was necessary to proscribe this traffic of robbery and murder—first, in order to purge Great Britain from its abominable contamination; secondly, because, if we extended our wishes farther—and who would not extend their wishes farther to have the trade abolished by other nations?—it was necessary that we should be able to say, “we have purged ourselves from the stain of this cruel and bloody commerce, and we are free from any farther imputation.” Having so done, Great Britain was then placed in the proper situation to call upon others to follow her example, and to afford the best hopes of success in the employment of every effort to procure the abolition all over the world of this inhuman and murderous commerce. It was unnecessary for him to recapitulate what had been done. Their lordships were aware that some of the most powerful countries had concurred with us, and that one considerable nation had even outrun us in this race of humanity: but while this bloody and atrocious traffic had been thus renounced among civilized nations, there were two powers by whom it was still continued; and with one of these all our efforts had proved ineffectual. He had papers in his hands, from which it appeared, that the trade was carried on in some degree by French, and even by Dutch subjects; but if the information which he had received was correct, it was chiefly carried on, first by the Portuguese, whose Government had refused to abolish it generally; and next by the Spaniards, should he say—no, but under the Spanish flag. As to the Portuguese, they carried on the trade, even within the limits which this country had been most anxious to protect, in a great and increasing degree: and if there was any foreign power from whom this country had concluded engagements, for onerous causes, to abolish in some measure this detestable traffic, he trusted their lordships would think it a proper subject of address to the Crown, to urge, with the most pressing importunities, the fulfilment of these engagements. From that, however, he passed to the case of Spain. Under the flag and in the name of Spain, and that, too, at a time when so many of her foreign possessions had disowned allegiance to her crown, the speculation in this accursed traffic was still carried on, to supply the void occasioned by the humanity of other governments. As to the limits within which it existed, there was one part of Africa to which this country had paid particular attention, and in which it had experienced considerable success in introducing the benefits of civilized life, and checking the course of this barbarous trade, which, while it continued, opposed an insurmountable obstacle to all civilization and improvement; and it was in that very quarter that the trade was most actively carried on. Such, then, was the quarter, and now for the manner. Before the resolution for the abolition of the slave traffic by this country had been adopted by Parliament, so unsupportable to the feelings of every human being, so monstrously horrible were the atrocious cruelties of the middle passage, as proved by evidence at the bar of that and the other House, that every man agreed that it ought to be regulated. He would not enter into a statement of particulars, for he had little inclination to enter into the calculations usually connected with this subject; but this he would say, that the warmest advocate of the abolition had never stated, had never imputed, never heard of, never conceived any thing so horrible, respecting the atrocities of the middle passage, as that which now appeared actually to prevail in this part of the slave traffic. Their lordships had, then, to represent to the Crown, if they chose to make any representation, that this traffic was carried on by Spain and Portugal, within those limits from which Great Britain had been particularly anxious to exclude it; and with circumstances of such barbarity, that, if their lordships could possibly make it present to their own minds, it would be impossible for them to endure the reflection. They had to represent that thousands and millions were exposed to these appalling atrocities, the very picture of which could hardly be contemplated by any man in whose heart there existed the slightest feeling of humanity but they would consider, that what revolted them to hear or look at, did not revolt others to do; and did not revolt their governments to sanction, though in opposition to the clamours of Europe. The statement to which he was now about to call their attention, was that of a British officer, made upon oath. It was an affidavit of Lieutenant James Eike, made on the 17th of March, 1816. (See p. 1790.) Upon this document, he should simply ask them, whether they had ever imagined, whether they believed any individual had ever conceived, that there were any persons capable of carrying on this horrible trade, with the calculation that more than one half of the unhappy beings embarked would perish in so short a voyage. No such calculation of loss of life, he was persuaded, had ever entered the mind of any man. He had had frequent occasion to direct his attention to this subject, and he certainly had never read or heard of any thing to equal this barbarous murder.—The officer who made this affidavit had stated, that those unfortunate Africans were used worse than brute beasts, and there was no man whose mind would not recoil with horror from the idea of treating any beings under his control whether human or not, with such cruelty. It was the duty of his Majesty's Government to inform the Portuguese Court fully of these barbarous transactions. They must inform that and other Governments of the nature of the frightful system to which they so pertinaciously adhered. The paper he had read, it was true, applied directly to the conduct of the Portuguese only; but he mistook much, if it did not afford a picture of the trade in general. He doubted not, that it was equally characteristic of the trade of Spain. He had not circumstances of the same nature to lay before their lordships, respecting Spanish ships; but he had the declaration of a British officer, of no less a person than Sir James Yeo, which proved the situation of the slaves in Spanish ships to be dreadful, beyond any thing that had ever been contemplated. Sir James stated, that the San Antonio, of only 120 tons burden, had 600 slaves on board. Now, let any man, acquainted with the former examinations on this subject, and with the accommodation required for transports, consider what must be the situation of such a number of human beings, confined to so small a space. The description of this dreadful state of suffering, was not applicable only to the ship captured, but was a proof of the general manner in which the Spanish trade was carried on.—Was it possible, then, to present to their lordships, a case which could have a stronger claim to their attention? Was it possible, that they could require any additional motives for their interference to put an end to these multiplied barbarities? He entreated them to bear in mind, that there never was, there never could be, a stronger claim than that which Africa had on this country. We had been among the foremost to inflict wrong, it became us to be the foremost to redress it; and there were in the state of the times, and the situation of this country with respect to other powers, circumstances which afforded reason to hope that our representations, if firmly made, would prove effectual. If in the government of any country there should be found a man who would say, in answer to our representations, that he disregarded the principle of humanity, and that he would only consider this question with respect to our interest to interfere in it; to such a person the reply should be, that the trade of this country could not be carried on with that security which belonged to peaceful commerce while this traffic in slaves was permitted to exist. This observation applied not merely to the trade with Africa, but to our trade to every other part of the globe. If their lordships reflected on the facts which had been disclosed upon the most unquestionable evidence, they would be convinced that the destruction of peaceful commerce must be the result of the continuance of the atrocious system he had described. In the first place, with regard to Africa, the trade, it was evident, could not be carried on without counteracting all the efforts that had been made for its civilization, and replunging the whole line of coast into barbarism. In the second place, it was carried on under a regular system of defence. He could quote no less than 20 cases of armed vessels, bearing the Spanish flag, having committed acts of violence, not only against the peaceful commerce of British subjects, but against the national flag of this country. If this system was suffered to go on, could it be expected that the aggressors would be confined to the African seas? No, every branch of commerce and navigation would at length suffer, and the world would again be forced back into a state of general warfare. Was it a common, an indifferent thing, to see trading vessels in a period of profound peace armed as in war? Even in a time of war, when men were called upon to act in self-defence, no merchant ship could be armed without the owners, in the first place, gave security that the flag of the country would not be made to cover abuses, nor be employed in transactions which the Government could not approve; but the ships of which he had spoken possessed no letters of marque, and had received no sanction, as armed vessels, from the Spanish Government. They were armed only because they were fitted out to commit crimes. If the Government of the United States of America was applied to on the subject of such vessels bearing the American flag, that Government disclaimed them; the slave trade had long been abolished by the United States, and if the persons on board of these vessels were Americans, they were violators of the public law of their country. If the Government of Spain was applied to, that Government, it was true, defended the right of Spanish subjects to the African trade, but did not defend the commission of crime. No country, therefore, even those which had not abolished the traffic in human beings, would vindicate criminal depredations committed by vessels bearing its flag—depredations which amounted to acts of piracy. In this situation of things, his Majesty's Ministers had a right, and were indeed called upon to make representations to all foreign powers whose flag was used by armed vessels in the African trade, as the proceedings in which these vessels were engaged must degenerate, as in fact they had already degenerated, into acts of violence against the peaceful commerce of this country. Having made these representations, if they should not be effectual, if the powers to whom they were made found themselves incapable of repressing the acts of violence committed by vessels under their flag, we should then be entitled to act against such vessels as pirates. To any question that might be raised as to the right of this country to interfere on the ground of our interests being affected, Ministers had the strongest possible answer to make—they had to claim for the trade of this country a free navigation in time of peace. Such was the duty of the Government; and with regard to Parliament, there never was a case in which the necessity of its interference was more evident, or in which their lordships were more urgently called upon to strengthen, by a declaration of their opinion, the hands of Administration in the negotiations now pending. God forbid that he should doubt the zeal of those who had the conduct of these matters; but, under all the circumstances of the case, silence on the part of their lordships would be a dereliction of duty. It would be a neglect not to give to the Crown that additional strength which the manifestation of their opinion could give, and which, therefore, ought not to be withheld. Upon a recent occasion, one of the very powers to which he had, with reluctance, been obliged to allude, as concerned in these transactions, had adopted the course of making representations to the powers of Europe, on an aggression alleged to have been committed by another power, and the ground of the representations was precisely that which he had recommended in this case, namely, the probability of the aggression leading to war. It was accordingly considered by the parties to whom the representations were addressed, that they had a right, founded on their interests, to interfere, not only with their good offices, but to exercise all the weight of their powerful mediation, in order to prevent the flames of war from being again lighted up. Their interference was founded on the same principle as that which he pressed on the attention of their lordships: for if the African trade was to be continued, it could only be carried on in the manner he had described, and, therefore, could not fail in time to produce hostilities between this country and Spain. Upon those grounds we had a right to call for the interposition of every State in Europe, in putting down a system fraught with such danger to the peace of the world. They had already bound themselves to us, and we had bound ourselves to them, that nothing should be neglected that could contribute to the termination of this atrocious traffic. There was one topic more on which he should say a word before he sat down. Cases had already occurred in which officers in the service of this country had been exposed to complaints of having committed pretended irregularities in attacks on Spanish ships. He must take this opportunity of declaring, that if any question should arise as to compensations claimed for such transactions, he, for one, should require not only proof that the capture or attack was irregular, but that it was not the result of the improper system pursued by those who set up the claim. Their lordships, he hoped, would take care that, under the pretence of granting redress, they were not led to make a concession which might tend to confirm the evils they wished to remove.—The noble lord concluded by moving an address to the Prince Regent, similar in effect to that moved in the Commons yesterday by Mr. Wilberforce. (See page 1793.)

The Earl of Liverpool approved of the address, and observed, that he had never entertained but one opinion on this subject, namely, that the abolition to be made effectual for the purposes of humanity must be total; that it must not only be the work of Great Britain, but of every commercial country. If their lordships looked back to the circumstances under which this trade had been carried on, and above all, to the prejudices which had prevailed on the subject—prejudices which had been worked upon in a way to raise doubts as to the conduct of this country in the abolition—they must be convinced that much had been done: at the same time he was ready to acknowledge that much remained to be done. Prudential considerations induced him to refrain from entering into any details at present; but, if no unforeseen circumstance should arise, he thought he should be able to give a full explanation of all that had passed respecting the negotiations with other powers by the commencement of the next session of Parliament.

The address was then agreed to unanimously*.
MARRIAGE CEREMONY.] The Marquis of

* It has since been stated, that Spain has agreed to the abolition of the Trade, commencing with the year 1820.

Lansdowne presented a petition of the Associated Unitarians of Kent and Sussex, praying to be relieved from the operation of the Marriage Act. (See page 1780.) It was laid upon the table.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENT BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of this bill.

The Earl of Donoughmore opposed the measure, first, because it increased the patronage of Government, while it deprived grand juries of the power of appointing their own officers; and, secondly, because no alteration of the present system would be necessary, if proper care were taken by the sheriffs to return respectable juries. He moved as an amendment, that the bill be read a third time this day three months.

The Earl of Limerick supported the bill. Great abuses had been committed by grand juries, and as this bill went to deprive them of the power of imposing burdens on the country for private purposes, it would be productive of more real benefit to Ireland than the much desired advantage of opening to the peasant the opportunity of becoming a Lord Chancellor.

The Earl of Caledon thought the noble lord should have pointed out the particular grand juries which had been guilty of abuses. In the province of Ulster, with which he was acquainted, no such charge could apply.

The Earl of Limerick explained. He did not mean to contradict the account which the noble lord gave of the north of Ireland; but he repeated that great abuses with respect to grand juries had prevailed in different parts of Ireland.

The Earl of Blessington totally differed from the noble lord, as to the imputation on grand juries. He thought the bill unnecessary.

The Marquis of Lansdowne supported the bill. He was fully convinced, that the power which grand juries possessed in Ireland required the control which this measure provided.

The amendment was then negatived without a division, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, July 10.

LYME REGIS HARBOUR.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the order of the day be read for an address in aid of the repair of Lyme Regis Harbour. (See page 1781.)

Mr. Gordon said, that it was unfair to bring on the discussion of this question at so early a time (a few minutes after four), when some members were absent who, it was known, would oppose the grant, for instance, the member for Rochester (Mr. Calcraft). It was not generally understood that public business would begin before half-past four o'clock.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that as there was no other business before the House, he should move the address.

Mr. Gordon then moved, that the House be counted.

The House was accordingly counted, and there being but 31 members present, they adjourned.

Friday, July 11.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Frivolous Arrests Bill; the Extents in Aid Bill; the Irish Saving Banks Bill; the Employment of the Poor Amendment Bill; the Frame-Breaking Prevention Bill; the Irish Lunatic Asylums Bill; the Irish Grand Jury Presentments Bill; the Alnage Abolition (Ireland) Bill; and the Cottage Exemption (Scotland) Bill.

MADHOUSES.] The Marquis of Lansdowne rose to call the attention of the House to a bill which lay on their table for the regulation of madhouses. His object was to move, that the bill be read a second time this day three months; for, independent of the late period of the session at which it came before them, there were other objections to it, which could hardly have been got over. He thought the appointment of a commission to superintend madhouses, would be a very proper regulation; but there were other minute matters to which he and others would have objected, and the bill was altogether too complicated to be amended. There might be strong objections to the registration of the names of persons confined; and, perhaps, the most effectual regulations that could be adopted by the Legislature would be to provide that proper security should be required as to the persons keeping houses of this description, and as to the situation, size, and accommodations of such houses, and to appoint a commission to superintend these establishments, and to report from time to time to the Secretary of State. That some legislative regulations ought to be adopted, he was decidedly convinced, and few could doubt who had read the valuable Reports which had been published by the Committee of the other House on this subject. He trusted, therefore, that their lordships' attention would be called to the matter at an early period of the next session. He concluded by moving, that the bill be read a second time this day three months.

Earl Bathurst entirely concurred with the noble marquis as to the present bill, and as to other matters connected with the subject which he had mentioned. The Reports did the Committee great credit, and certainly some legislative regulation was called for. He trusted the noble marquis himself would give his attention to the subject; none being better qualified than he was to form a just judgment as to the regulations that might be most beneficial.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that the publication of the Reports had done much to remedy the evil; because, when these matters were known, few would persevere in p revolting to the common feelings of mankind: but if a bill should be brought up from the Commons, or otherwise introduced into this House next session, he trusted that the object would be to simplify its regulations, and direct them against the principal evil; for the Legislature would do no good by attempting to make these minor matters the subject of parliamentary enactment. He should have liked this bill much better, if it had proposed to enact the appointment of one commission instead of four: and as to the registration of the names, it would be highly desirable in one view that it should be known who were confined in these Houses; but on the other hand, there were great objections to the plan; and, upon the whole, he agreed that this bill, independent of the objection on account of the late period of the session, was not, for other reasons, such as ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to be read a second time this day three months.

Friday, July 11.

COLONIAL ACTS.] The Colonial Acts, which were presented on the 6th of June (see page 1336.) were ordered to be returned to the Secretary of State's Office, for the Colonial Department.

WATCH-MAKERS COMMITTEE.] The Committee appointed to inquire into the petitions of Watch-makers was presented, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPT LAWS COMMITTEE.] This Committee presented their Report.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

NEW WRIT FOR THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.] Mr. Lushington moved for a New Writ, for the Borough of Harwich, in the room of the Right Hon. Nicholas Vansittart, appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer of Ireland.

NEW WRIT FOR MR. PONSONBY.] Mr. Lamb rose, to move for a new writ, for the county of Wicklow, in the room of the Right hon. George Ponsonby deceased. In making this motion, the hon. member said, he could not content himself with passing it over in the ordinary manner: this would not be doing justice to the character of him whom they had lost, nor could he reconcile it to the respect, the regard and the affection, which he had always entertained for him. Some tribute was due to the memory of the dead, and it was not less required to satisfy the feelings of the living. On the present occasion, this tribute would be willingly paid, not merely by those connected by the ties of blood and friendship, but by the members—by all the members (Hear, hear, from the Treasury benches) of that House, and by the community at large, who knew Mr. Ponsonby only as a public man, from the share which he had taken in the discussions of that House. Never on any former occasion—and many such mournful occasions had occurred of late—never had there been displayed more unequivocal symptoms of heartfelt grief and sincere regret. (Hear, hear.) It was not his intention to enter into a history of Mr. Ponsonby's public life, or to detail the incidents of his early years. Greatly was he distinguished in the Irish Parliament; and so pre-eminently distinguished at the Irish Bar, that when he was called to the office of Lord Chancellor in that country in 1806, at a time when party feelings ran high, and when appointments were canvassed with the greatest asperity, not a single murmur of disapprobation was raised against the choice which selected him to fill the highest judicial situation. The important duties of that office he discharged with unquestionable ability and integrity. When he retired from it, he was placed in a situation in that House, which it would be improper to designate more distinctly, but which all would understand. That station he filled during times of great difficulty and embarrassment, times which had exhibited almost all the aspects which human affairs could assume, and it would be admitted by his political enemies, as well as his political friends, that he conducted himself with prudence, temperance, liberality, and discretion. (Hear.) To an ardent love of liberty, and an anxious zeal to defend and maintain it, he joined the utmost simplicity of character, which communicated itself to his eloquence, and this, combined with the conviction entertained in the House and the country, of the sincerity of his professions, and the soundness of his understanding, obtained for him that confidence which had often been denied to more studied and ambitious oratory. So great was the importance of the numerous questions which had been agitated in that House during the last ten years, that the various biasses, the difference of feelings, of habits, of pursuits of different members, must have led them, on some important occasions, to disagree with a man whom they loved and respected; but, all who thus disagreed with him, loved and respected him still. Those who had an opportunity of observing how he prepared himself for such questions, could bear testimony to the anxious care and perfect sincerity with which his opinions were formed.—These few observations he offered, not with the vain hope of doing justice to the talents and the conduct of Mr. Ponsonby, but to gratify his own feelings, and to afford the House an opportunity of expressing their respect and regret for a man at once so eminent and so estimable. (Hear.) He was an honour to the family from which he sprung, and to the country that gave him birth, fruitful as that country was in men of distinguished talents, as well civil as military. He was justly and deeply lamented, and although they had lost him not in the most difficult times—although it could not be said of him "alienissimo Reipublice tempore extinctus"*—yet it was at a time when the country might have derived essential advantages from his understanding, his moderation, and his prudence. That they had seen him so lately in that House (hear, hear,) apparently in perfect stability of health, and likely long, from his time of life, to enjoy vigour of mind and body, must greatly increase the sense of sorrow and regret. That they had themselves seen him struck by that fatal malady which laid him at once on the couch from which he never rose, must give a keenness to their recollection of his merits, and their sorrow for his loss. (Hear, hear.) To them it furnished a most awful lesson, and they would take the best means of profiting by it, if they cherished in their memory and imitated the integrity of his conduct, the purity of his mind, and the innocence of his heart.—(Hear, hear, hear.) The hon. member concluded with moving for the writ.

Lord Castlereagh said, he did not less feelingly lament the loss which the House and the country had sustained, than those with whom the right hon. gentleman had agreed in political opinions; and he equally felt the force and truth of the observations which had been so eloquently applied to the subject. A wound so deep as was occasioned by the death of one so distinguished in public life, a wound so suddenly inflicted, and so fresh in the recollection of the House, could not but be felt most strongly. No occasion was more gratifying than one in which the warmest testimony must be borne to the honour, integrity, and worth of men who differed in political opinion—and he hoped those differences were for the public good—by persons of opposite sentiments. He had been opposed to Mr. Ponsonby in politics, both in this country and in Ireland; and he could say, with the utmost sincerity, that the conduct of that eminent man had been always governed by the highest sense of honour and integrity, and a most anxious desire to promote the public good. (Hear, hear.)

Sir M. W. Ridley said, he felt it his duty to join in the testimony which had been given to the public merits of that distinguished character, whose loss was so universally deplored. His family had rendered great and splendid services to their country; and, in future times, the bravery of colonel Ponsonby in the field of battle, and the honest, upright, and independent conduct of the right hon. George Ponsonby, in that House, would be read with universal admiration and gratitude. (Hear.)

The writ was then ordered.

LYME REGIS HARBOUR.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved an address to the Prince Regent, that he would be pleased to direct, that such repairs might be executed upon the Cobb at Lyme, as would not occasion an expense exceeding 10,000*l.*

Mr. Gordon objected to the mode of obtaining money to such an amount by address to the Crown.

Mr. Lushington stated five cases in point, as to the mode; and insisted on the importance of the repairs now required.

Mr. Calcraft observed, that he had been misunderstood by the hon. member (Mr. Gordon), who had represented him as disposed to give any opposition to the measure. (See page 1825.) He complained only of the delay, and of the mode adopted.

Mr. Croker explained the circumstances that occasioned the delay. The address was then agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of John Knight, who had been kept in solitary confinement in Reading gaol for more than 17 weeks, and was now removed to another prison. The hon. baronet observed, that some years since petitions used to be presented by foreigners, praying to be naturalized; this petitioner prayed to be unnaturalized, or to be brought to trial. It was pretty evident that there was no intention to bring him at all to trial. He hoped that some one of his Majesty's Ministers would declare their intention to discharge him, if no trial was intended. It was disgraceful to this country, or to any civilized country, but most of all to this country, where the principles of liberty had been established by a free Constitution, that men could be confined in solitary cells for any length of time without ever knowing the reason. The petition was then read: it prayed to be brought to trial, or to be transported out of the country. It was ordered to lie on the table.

MASQUERADES.] General Thornton gave notice, that he would next session bring in a bill respecting masquerades.

Mr. Blake wished to know what was to be the nature of the bill.

The Speaker said that it was not regular to call for any such explanation till the hon. member brought on his motion.

STATE OF THE NATION.] Mr. Brougham rose, to call the attention of the House to the present situation of the country. He said, if no public principles had been violated during the session, and if at its close they were to leave the liberties of the people on their ancient foundation, and the power of the Crown within its constitutional limits, he would not have trespassed on their indulgence; but when the expectations of the country had been so great at the beginning of the session, when the disappointment in its course was so signal and so afflicting, and above all, when the rights and liberties—when the personal freedom of every man in the nation, was put in the power of Ministers, he could not allow them to separate before he had endeavoured to prevail on them to exercise the wholesome but difficult duty of self-examination, and to carry to the foot of the throne an humble address, praying that the extraordinary powers which they had given should not be abused. The distresses every where felt at the beginning of the session, months indeed before the beginning of the sion, all must well remember. In the midst of such sufferings, some symptoms might be traced of great discontent, of an anxious desire of change: here and there some disturbances were created by persons, inconsiderable in character and influence, and even in point of numbers—by such persons, who either from defect of intellect, or desire of converting general distress to purposes of plunder, a few breaches of the public peace were committed. All those symptoms might be traced before the beginning of the session; but there was one symptom, universally manifested, and without example in any former period of our history—it was an anxious, universal expectation of redress and relief. This hope was every where entertained, but was most deeply cherished where the distress was greatest. (Hear, hear.) How did the House answer those expectations? They began, not by relieving the people, but by restraining them. Before they asked them their complaints or their wishes, they took away their liberties. When at last they inquired into the distresses, and found that many means of relieving them were practicable, when Ministers themselves agreed that our system of commerce and trade required revision, they immediately passed on to the other orders of the day. In no period of history, in no nation or country, was an instance known of a people, so universally, so strongly, so unconquerably, and in such overwhelming distress and suffering, attached to their natural protectors and guardians, and so confident of attention to their grievances, and of relief from their sufferings. If when the people met to petition Parliament for a redress of their grievances, if when they were evincing their attachment to the constitution, by expressing their confidence in the good disposition and wisdom of the legislature, a demagogue had stood up and predicted what happened, saying, “Look not to Parliament for assistance in your misery, or even a favourable consideration of your sufferings; go not there, the attempt is useless, they will not hear your petitions; they will not discuss the means of answering; they will neglect your representations, and pass to the order of the day,” the House would have heard of it as a symptom of disaffection, and a menace of rebellion. (Hear, hear.) Much had been said of the absurd projects of the reformers, and of the folly of looking at Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments as a remedy for existing distress; and the historian, in looking back upon this period, would have to describe many instances of that disposition which suffering generates, to rely credulously on the most improbable means of relief; but he would likewise have to record, that in resisting applications of the people for a redress of grievances, Parliament had committed remarkable departures from the constitution. For universal suffrage and annual parliaments, however inconsistent they were, in the opinion of many, with the nature of our political fabric, could not be more contrary to it than the mode in which the representations and interests of the people had been treated was to the spirit of our constitution. Innumerable petitions were presented, and their allegations ought to have been inquired into. They were, however, neglected, and no measures were adopted but those of coercion and punishment. As nothing had been done by the House, as no examination into grievances took place, and no plan of improvement was adopted, it might be proper to inquire what amelioration had ensued, independent of parliamentary aid; and what the course of events had accomplished, after Ministers had refused to direct it to any beneficial result. He was ready to admit, that in looking at our affairs in this way, the prospect was somewhat brightened. The effects of the late scanty harvest were not so severely felt, and were in some degree removed: an increase had taken place in the value of land; and the price of the funds had risen; our trade, too, had somewhat improved, and hopes were entertained of a continued amelioration. In stating, however, that our commerce was improving, he was bound to say, that there was something rather alarming in the accounts of the last two quarters. He alluded to the scanty supply of the last harvest, and the consequent revival of the importation of grain under the provisions of the corn bill. The opening of our ports for corn had thus operated as a practical remedy for the depreciation of our general commerce, without being an evidence of its growing prosperity. Corn was the only commodity which, under certain circumstances, could be imported duty free: and the demand for it in the season of scarcity was the only cause, it was to be feared, of the additional stimulus given to our export trade or our manufacturing industry. To shew this he need only remind the House, that the customs had in the last quarters fallen off instead of improving; which accorded very well with the fact, that there might be an additional import of corn, but was perfectly inconsistent with any improvement in our general commerce or import. Another symptom of our improving condition was stated to be the rise in the funds; an effect which might be attributed to one of two causes—the one permanent and beneficial, the other temporary, and rather a sign of distress than a proof of amelioration. The former consisted in the reduction of our national expenditure, and the diminution of our public burdens (for which his Majesty’s Ministers, who opposed every measure of retrenchment, and refused to adopt any recommendation of economy till it was forced upon them, could claim no credit), by which the savings of individuals were increased, and not being required for the supply of their immediate wants, were invested in the funds; thus creating a demand for stock and raising its price. The latter consisted in the want of employment for capital, in the stagnation of trade, and the want of any other mode of deriving interest for money in the possession of capitalists. This would entirely disappear with the revival of commerce; which, when it took place, would lower the funds, by inducing people to invest their money in more beneficial employment. That there was no unequivocal improvement in the situation of the country, or in the general condition of the people, notwithstanding these alleged symptoms of returning prosperity, might be proved from the experience that every man had of what must be the state of our manufacturers, when an able and skilful weaver could not earn more, by his greatest exertion, than six or seven shillings a week; and from the knowledge of the general distress under which our agricultural population laboured. (Hear, hear.) But even admitting that there had been some improvement, was that a reason why we should relax in our efforts to hasten the return of general prosperity. Were we to refrain from taking steps to ameliorate our condition, because it was not just so bad as it was four months ago? Because we had sunk to a point of distress beyond which we could not go, and were now rising out of its depths, were we to be told that no efforts were to be made for our further extrication? (Hear, hear.) This, he knew, was always the answer of Ministers to any suggestions or recommendations of improvement—that we were already rising from our difficulties, and that matters would right themselves. If we could be proved not to be so bad as we were six calendar months ago, they were satisfied, and desired to stand still. This principle of conduct he entirely disapproved of and denounced. So long as we could improve our affairs, so long as there was one beneficial arrangement unexecuted, it was criminal to be idle, it was a gross dereliction of duty to stand still with our arms folded across, and to trust without exertion to the issue of events. (Hear, hear, hear.) It became the House, therefore, to review what was proposed to be done, and what was actually performed. In this review, sufficient subjects of condemnation would occur, without requiring from Ministers more than they could have executed, or from Parliament more than it could have accomplished. No man charged Ministers with the consequence of a bad harvest; no man attributed blame to them for those sufferings and evils that must always more or less attend that revulsion of society, and that dislocation of the relations of manufacturing industry, which are occasioned in a transition from war to peace, however liable they were to charge from the long continuance or wasteful expenditure of that war; but sufficient subjects for censure still remained. They were told, that on the return of peace our system required review; that the world was placed in new circumstances; that our relations with the rest of Europe had changed; that the progress of events required an alteration of our policy; that the great interests of our commerce, and the body of our commercial regulations, demanded examination; and that the state of our finances, so deranged, should be brought fully under the view of the legislature, to know completely how we stood, and what improvements could be adopted. Now what was done in these circumstances, or what answer was given to these recommendations? When he brought forward the subject of our trade and manufactures, a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson,) who was at the head of the Board of Trade, and from his situation was bound to have entered on the inquiry, had admitted every thing that he stated, and had candidly confessed the errors of our commercial policy. In his memorable declaration in the House—memorable for the candour with which it was uttered, memorable for the liberality of the principles which it sanctioned, and which he shewed he so well understood; but still more memorable for the striking admission with which it was coupled—he allowed that he saw the great errors and pernicious tendency of the narrow and absurd system on which the trade of the country was conducted; but that hostile representations and conflicting interests stood in the way of new arrangements, or any beneficial improvements. To what he had advanced the right hon. gentleman answered—“We admit your principles to be incontrovertible—we confess our present commercial regulations are impolitic, and that a change would be desirable; but when we propose any improvement for the general advantage, in come the shipping interests, in come the conflicting commercial and manufacturing interests, beset the Board of Trade, and oppose each other before us; and what can we do?” The merchants employed in the iron trade, those employed in the wood trade, the miners, the manufacturers, the shipping interest, had all different objects, all prayed for the continuance or enactment of restrictive regulations, and no satisfactory adjustment could be made of their conflicting claims: what, therefore, could be done? The right hon. gentleman confessed the inability of government to control these opposing individuals; and with this confession of imbecility, was contented to adhere to a pernicious and erroneous system, with the full view of its impolicy and absurdity. Nay, even the statute imposing a duty on the transit of foreign linen, than which he might say a more absurd regulation did not exist on the statute-book of any country that had a book, was allowed to continue, because, though it confessedly cramped the commerce of the country, and injured the general prosperity, the right hon. gentleman dreaded that its repeal would set the north of Ireland in a flame. (Hear, hear.) Now, when the House saw this miserable weakness, when they heard an admission of just principles, but a confession that, from conflicting interests, they could not be carried into effect; when a Minister at the head of the department of trade, with an interesting candour and touching simplicity, allowed that the country was proceeding in an impolitic course; but that when he tried to effect any improvement he encountered an opposition which he could not overpower, was it proper to pass to the other orders of the day? (Hear, hear, hear.) Was it becoming to allow the plea, that what you say is right—what you recommend would benefit the country; but, because the petty and partial interests of those engaged in the iron, the copper, the wood, and the linen trade, oppose us, we cannot enter into a review of commercial regulations, or listen to any suggestions of beneficial change? The House should have said, we allow your claim of imbecility, but it ought not to prejudice the welfare of the country—we will back your efforts for improvement, and enable you to overcome those conflicting claims which you confess your incapacity to adjust. (Hear, hear.) But instead of this, the House passed to the order of the day (cries of hear); and now, though we had arrived at the third year of peace, and should have long ago inquired into the commercial policy of the country, no examination had yet taken place, nor had any thing been yet done. With regard to our financial system we were in a different situation. On this subject there was no admission similar to that of the right hon. president of the Board of Trade. The right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), whom he did not now see in his place, did make some opposition to himself (Mr. B.) and his friends. They pressed upon his attention, that in peace exorbitant duties could not be raised; and by reducing the taxes on articles which peace afforded such facilities of smuggling, he would increase the revenue. The right hon. gentleman was, however, of a different opinion, and would do nothing except they would allow his favourite measure of an income tax. (Cries of hear.) He therefore proceeded with his temporary and wavering expedients, now issuing Exchequer bills, now Treasury bills; now compounding with the Bank for a loan without interest, now taking one with interest; varying from year to year according to circumstances, watching the progress of events, doing nothing, and hoping that by the chapter of accidents every thing would come round to his wishes without any exertion. His system was to have no system, his plan of finance was to proceed entirely without plan (hear, hear), waiting till circumstances might change, or till the House, seeing the derangement of our financial affairs, would agree to the revival of the income-tax, of which he and the noble lord were nightly singing the dirge (hear, and a laugh)—an oppressive tax which had, he trusted, been condemned to perpetual extinction, and which the country would never be so destitute of spirit as to allow to be proposed, nor Parliament so abandoned to all sense of shame or duty as to enact. (Cries of hear.) If our commerce was in a bad state, our finances were calculated to excite greater alarm: The finance committee even could not venture a calculation, but were obliged to resort to an average. He had formerly stated what he would now repeat, that though our commerce might improve, it could never again reach that pitch of prosperity which it lately attained. This might easily be proved. There was at present an incapacity among the nations of the Continent to pay for our commodities, from the exhaustion of a ruinous and protracted war; and, unhappily for us, there existed a growing ability to supply themselves. Our great extent of machinery, our immense accumulation of capital, and our superior manufacturing skill, might ensure us great advantages in the market, but the people of the Continent were making rapid advances. Cotton-mills had been erected in the neighbourhood of Vienna, which manufactured twist of the best quality; and at Mulhausen, in Switzerland, a similar establishment was erected. Speaking on this subject, he could not but refer to the policy lately recommended in some petitions, of prohibiting the exportation of cotton-yarn. This appeared to him to be a delusion that had been fallen into by a large body who were suffering under the want of employment. A petition had been sent on the subject to the Prince Regent, and one was to have been offered to the House, signed by 200,000 individuals. He proposed to the petitioners to delay sending it up, as he hoped delay and discussion might dispel their prejudices; and to induce them to do so, held out to them the hope that, if circumstances did not change, their case might next session be inquired into by a parliamentary committee. He wished to hear every thing that could be said; but he deemed it his duty to mention, that he thought the more the subject was inquired into the greater would the impolicy of the prohibition appear; and that, instead of relieving the class who petitioned for it, it would impede general commerce, ruin the cotton spinners, injure the importers of cotton-wool, and, by rendering the yarn dearer to the weaver, involve him in the general calamity. (Hear, hear.) It was necessary to attend to the situation of this class of persons, the cotton-spinners, as among them, as well as among the other classes collected in great bodies, there was no permanent connexion between manufacturer and employer, and among them disaffection chiefly existed.—The next subject to which the hon. gentleman adverted, was our relation with the South American colonies, and here he found equal subject of complaint against his Majesty's government. He would not now enter fully into the subject. The impolicy of our conduct was sufficiently obvious—our want of system, plan, or object. In some places we had commercial agents, in others none. In one of the States we had a consul, who received his commission from Ferdinand, but who had not produced his credentials till the State to which he was accredited had declared itself independent, or had, as it was called in some quarters, revolted. Over the whole of South America there was a complaint of a want of communication, or of concert and understanding. The governors of our colonies acted in the same way as our government at home, or executed impolitic instructions received from this country. The governor of Trinidad openly opposed the cause of the independents, and took part against them with the mother country: opening letters addressed to them; refusing to admit into the island those who had been opposed to the royal arms; imposing contributions, sometimes to the amount of 200 dollars, on those who sought admission; and obstructing all communication between Trinidad and the Spanish Main, as much as was in his power. Since he last spoke in the House on this subject, he had heard that the intercourse between that island and the neighbouring continent had been so completely interrupted, that mules had risen forty dollars in price, and that the price of a pound of food, which was formerly five-pence, had risen to six shillings. Such a difference of price, amounting to a thousand per cent. in districts so contiguous, shewed the obstructions offered to all communication or commercial intercourse. If the policy of Government in this quarter was marked by illiberality, injustice, and absurdity, it had been equally so on the continent of Europe, and we were now reaping the bitter fruits of the noble lord's negotiations. He would not enter into any reasoning on the subject; he would state one fact which would be worth a thousand arguments. What he alluded to happened in the port of Genoa, disclosing a scene of as great tyranny and injustice on the one hand, as great oppression on the other, and as great imbecility in a third party as any act that had ever been heard of within the walls of the House. (Hear, hear.) It was well known, that though the King of Sardinia was one of the legitimate Sovereigns for whom we established the present order of things, yet that we found him possessed of small territory and of very limited power, and by expanding his narrow dominions, and giving him new subjects, we made him a creature of our own. Our exertions brought him from a barren island, restored him to his continental dominions, and endowed him with Genoa. This city was declared as free, because we gave it him, and because Congress declared it free. This petty dependent monarch, imitating the conduct of a greater illegitimate ope, prevailed, by the arguments to which the latter was accustomed to appeal, upon the Chamber of Commerce of that port, to contribute money to him for building a large frigate. The Chamber, to raise the money, assessed their own members, and the English, together with the French and Piedmontese merchants, who hate and envy the English, and wish to make the place too warm for them, in order to dislodge them. The English merchants remonstrated, but their remonstrances were not attended to. They applied to Mr. Hill, the British minister at the Court of Turin. Finding that this application was unsuccessful, they applied to the British consul, who made a representation to the Sardinian minister. The reply from him was, that the assessment was not at all an affair of government, but an arrangement made by the Chamber of Commerce, with which he could not interfere, and against which Government could grant no redress. The merchants made a representation to the Chamber, and resisted payment. This only produced a measure of oppression. A soldier was sent to the house of every English merchant, with orders to remain there till the mandate for raising the contribution was complied with, at the pay of three francs a day, to be levied on the person in whose house he remained. The merchants complained to the consul and the ambassador: the latter of whom disapproved of the proceeding; but added, there was no help for it, that he had done his utmost, and that the only course the merchants had was to submit. The whole of these proceedings were submitted to the noble lord, who must have been displeased at the ungracious return made for our exertions by a Sovereign who owed to him the means of oppressing British subjects. But what did he do? —did he afford that protection which the merchants had a right to expect, and speak to the Court of Sardinia with that energy which became the minister of Great Britain? No: he applied to the king's advocate, to know if it was lawful for the King of Sardinia to act as he had done; and even submitted to him a case which did not comprehend a full view of the circumstances. The tax was stated to be a general tax: and, as such, the imposition of it did not authorize going to war, or make it a duty for the British government to interfere. On this legal opinion the noble lord acted. Good God! was it becoming in a British minister, in such a case, to allow an injustice to be committed on a technical opinion; to make no remonstrance to a Sovereign who was under such obligations to us, when he oppressed our countrymen, merely because the king's advocate, on a partial representation of the case, said, that it was no ground for declaring war? (Hear.) When he (Mr. B.) read these papers, they excited his greatest astonishment; and, as an Englishman, made him blush for the degradation of the English character. If English merchants were to be thus treated, if they received no protection from the English government when oppressed by petty States, they might say with truth, we are a great naval power, a great and enlightened nation; but for all practical purposes we are an insignificant people, and cannot protect ourselves against the smallest aggression, or even send a memorial to the petty court of Sardinia. (Cries of hear, hear, hear.) This could not be expected to be a solitary instance of oppression, and accordingly it was followed by others. The first was a tariff on cloth, which gave so great advantages to the French manufacturers over us, that no British cloth could be imported into Genoa, as he had heard from a merchant of Yorkshire, whom he met at Milan. There was another tax imposed, called annonaria; and another was a duty on goods imported into Genoa for the purpose of exportation, similar to our transit duty on foreign linen. Would not this tame submission invite oppression from other Powers? Could Austria and Russia, those great States, be expected to shew us any regard, or grant us any commercial advantages, when we allowed ourselves to be insulted and trampled on by a creature of our own, the little King of Sardinia? (Cries of hear.) We had mistaken our proper policy, and descended from our legitimate rank. We were placed as arbiters of Europe, and could have ruled its destinies by throwing our weight into the scale if we chose; but we had surrendered that proud pre-eminence to become a fifth-rate military power—neither our safest nor our most dignified attitude, neither adding to our credit nor our security. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord boasted of his treaties; but if one attended to the state of Europe, there were evident symptoms of their instability. The state of arms in which the different Powers remained; the Holy Alliance, which seemed more of a political than a religious description; and the circumstance, that it originated with the two powers who bordered on Turkey, and had their views fixed on its dismemberment, together with the misunderstanding between Spain and Portugal, might lead to some interruption of the general peace at no distant date. He was perfectly ready to admit that there were matters on which it became us to make a different use of our influence, and he could not avoid referring, in this part of his speech, to the note of the Allied Powers respecting the situation of Lucien Buonaparte, which so deeply affected the honour and dignity of this country: what he had to lament was, not the mere refusal of passports for himself, but the refusal of them for his son; for, as in the case of Dyott's divorce bill, we had changed his petition into an enactment against him. He regretted also to see, not only the name of Sir C. Stuart, but that of the Duke of Wellington, to this document; regarding it, as he feared he must, to be an indication, that the Minister for civil affairs was bound to take his instructions from the military commander. In one part of this note, it was stated, that Lucien would be more dangerous in America than in Europe. Although it was somewhat difficult to conceive the grounds of this proposition, yet supposing it to be literally true, what was the real danger to be apprehended from him in either part of the world? He was a person, who, as far as he understood, was a great admirer of French poetry, and who, when not engaged in either reading or writing it, amused himself with digging up the remains of antiquity in the neighbourhood of Tusculum. When in this country, his whole deportment—and it had been vigilantly observed—was of the most peaceable and inoffensive nature. Was this spirit of persecution adopted in order that the new system of Europe might rival in all respects the treaty of Westphalia? The conclusion of this extraordinary note was, that another abode was necessary to be provided for him in the Roman States. Was it worthy, he would ask, of a great country? Was it worthy of whatever might yet remain of the ancient liberality of Britain, to be occupied, in conjunction with the other great powers of Europe, in devising a residence to which, when selected, the individual in question must be removed by force? (Hear, hear.) If it had happened in our times, and to the astonishment of an enlightened generation, that a monk, in spite of all the cry and prejudices of the popery doctrine, should be drawn from the recesses of a convent, and from amidst his beads and rosaries, to be erected into a temporal sovereign, was the world to understand that he was still to remain the instrument of those who had pretended to leave him independent? Was he to be represented to be so incapable of exercising the functions of sovereignty, that he had no control over the proceedings of an individual residing within his territories, and therefore other nations must interfere to prescribe the spot to which he ought to be confined, before their apprehensions could be allayed? He believed the whole intelligence with respect to the intrigues of Lucien in Naples was derived from certain diplomatic agents, who thought themselves obliged to be doing something like their fellow-labourers at home; and to whom red bags and large seals were the very luxuries of existence. Turning, however, from this waste of our legitimate influence abroad, he felt it his duty to advert to another subject of complaint, which was no less than the mismanagement of the patronage belonging to the Foreign department. It was painful to him to bring forward such a charge; and the more painful, as it necessarily affected some persons nearly and intimately connected with the noble lord at the head of that department. Whilst he expressed a hope, however, that a new system of appointments would take place in the conduct of our diplomacy, he was actuated by no personal feeling of hostility or disrespect. No man could entertain the smallest objection to any military distinction or appointment that might be conferred on Lord Cathcart or Lord Stewart; but other persons than those who were only known to the country as soldiers, and whose education had been purely military, were required to execute the high and difficult trusts of the missions to Petersburg and Vienna. He considered that it was sufficient for him to touch generally upon this subject, in order to shew that there had been an abuse of this very delicate branch of the public patronage. He had long abstained from alluding to it openly, and it was with sincere reluctance he now stated, that there was but one opinion at Vienna and elsewhere, as to the fitness of Lord Stewart to execute the functions of Minister at that Court. If the noble lord, instead of inquiring in his own person, would delegate another to make the inquiry for him, for many truths might be told to a third party which could not be communicated to principals, he would venture to predict that the result would be a similar representation. He was confident that he had never uttered, nor even heard, a single sentence which reflected on the high personal honour and professional merits of the two noble lords whom he had named, but their education itself afforded a presumption of their inadequacy; and whilst their appointments were a matter of regret, the whole blame of them rested with the noble lord opposite, who conducted the foreign relations of the country. It was observable, also, in the consideration of this subject, that a military person, Colonel Stirling, had been appointed British consul at Genoa, although the nomination of Reynolds and Manners to similar offices called for much deeper reprobation. Having commented at such length on these various topics of foreign policy, it remained for him to say a few words on what appeared to him to be the greatest evil of all, he meant the present lamentable posture of the Constitution. (Hear, hear.) No man who wished well to the interests and happiness of this country, could turn his eyes back to the commencement of this session, and recollect, without a bitter pang, the hopes which it was then natural and reasonable to indulge in. All who had contemplated the improvement and extension of education, the removal of so many disputed questions, the abatement of party zeal, and the consequent union of sentiment which had grown up in the public mind, must have been grievously disappointed to find a new strength acquired to the cause of bigotry and misgovernment. (Hear, hear.) The anti-Catholic had begun to raise his tone, and he thought he could descry the hands from the handwork of some noble lords, both on the floor and on the table, from which he was induced to suspect a repetition of an old and well-known intrigue, not very favourable to some of the present Ministers, and still less favourable to the accession of others, whose principles must for ever prevent a connexion with the authors and promoters of a no popery cry: but in whatever quarter such designs might be entertained, their existence, or the dread of their existence, was enough to damp the hopes of every friend to the liberties and prosperity of the empire. The Catholic was, in his view of the public interests, the all-important question; it was not, as sometimes represented, a mere question as to individuals, but it was whether Ireland should be well or ill governed. Until it should be carried, the same principle of distinction which reigned in the West Indies between the planter and the negro must operate in Ireland to the extent of preventing the Catholic and the Protestant from regarding each other as brothers and fellow-subjects. Until this question should be carried in favour of the cause of justice and of liberal policy, our financial resources would derive no augmentation from that quarter, nor would tranquillity be maintained by any other means than by an overwhelming military force. To this disappointment was to be added the melancholy fact, that in this part of the empire we had seen (for the first time since the revolution, in a period of foreign and internal peace), with hardly domestic dissension enough to scare a child, the liberties of the country abandoned, not for a limited time, but durante bene placito, to the Government. (Hear.) Such a proceeding, fearful under all circumstances, was a matter of peculiar jealousy and alarm, when it was considered to whom this power was intrusted, and by what hands it was to be exercised. With regard to the noble lord opposite, it could not be forgotten with what scenes his administration in Ireland had formerly been attended. He presumed that the noble lord had been ignorant of them at the time of their occurrence, but the circumstances were on record: it was not now a fact that could be controverted, that men had been flogged with a merciless spirit, which was not satiated till their bones appeared to the face of day. (Hear, hear.) It was not to be denied, that one man who had been thus lacerated had been rubbed over with gunpowder, in order to be a second time mangled, till his bowels burst through his wounds, and was then abandoned without medical aid. When this man afterwards brought his action against the individual who had inflicted the punishment, it was equally true that that individual petitioned the Irish parliament for a bill of indemnity, on the avowed principle of his having employed torture in order to extort truth. He alluded now to the case of Wright versus Fitzgerald, in which the Attorney-general had supported the application, and the petitioner had been afterwards made a baronet. If all this took place, and the noble lord remained in ignorance of it, although in his immediate vicinity, how was he, sitting in London, to prevent similar barbarities in Cornwall and in Yorkshire? If the Government was substantially the same as it was at that period, what greater security was there against the abuse of such unlimited authority? He knew not how the sagacity of Lord Sidmouth was to operate more effectually than that of his colleagues or predecessors, to prevent an innocent man from being dragged from his family, and immured in a loathsome dungeon, on the information of such persons as Oliver and Reynolds. All that now remained however, for the House to do, after having vested such powers in the executive government, was to address the Crown, and to press upon its attention the necessity during the recess of Parliament of at least exercising them with caution, forbearance, and moderation. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by moving,

"That an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, humbly to represent to his Royal Highness, that his Majesty's faithful subjects, the Commons of the united kingdom in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach his Royal Highness with sentiments of attachment to his illustrious family, and to the sacred principles of civil and religious liberty which seated them upon the throne of these realms :

"That arrived at the close of a session, the commencement of which had filled our constituents with the sanguine expectations that some of their grievances would be redressed, we deem it incumbent on us to express our deep concern that the measures of his Royal Highness's advisers, have neither been calculated to fulfil the hopes, to alleviate the sufferings, nor to recover the affections of the people :

"That it is with deep concern that we observe in every part of his Royal Highness's dominions nearly the same pressure of distress, which at the beginning of the session was lamented as unparalleled in the history of the country ; and that although we are disposed to hope that some portion of the evil may be temporary, we should trifle with his Royal Highness did we not declare our fixed opinion, that the changes which have happened in the world will prove permanently ruinous to a great part of our foreign commerce, if they are not counteracted by corresponding alterations in our commercial policy, and by the extension of our intercourse with countries removed from the influence of our rivals ; but that we have heard with surprise and regret, from his Royal Highness's advisers, an avowal of principles, which remove to a hopeless distance all expectations of seeing so salutary a system adopted : that we find that they dare not oppose themselves to the conflict of the mercantile interests, by which they represent themselves to be surrounded ; that to the menaces and importunities of individuals they sacrifice their own declared opinions ; and that, instead of anxiously seeking for the means of restoring the healthful state of British commerce, they remain passive spectators of its progressive decline, and abandon their duty towards the whole empire, in order to escape the interested clamours of a few :

"That equally great has been our disappointment at finding that no measures have been adopted for lessening the enormous weight of the taxes, grievous even in prosperous times, but at a period like the present, hardly to be endured : that, when we consider how heavily those burdens press on the trade of the country, diminishing at once our home consumption and our power of competition in foreign markets, and reflect that, in a season of general distress, the operation of the Poor Laws inevitably throws an unequal share of the load upon the land, we are at a loss to conceive more powerful reasons for reducing the excessive amount of taxation ; the more especially because experience has proved the revenue itself to have been injured by that excess : that after the return of peace we had hoped, that a new and permanent arrangement of our financial system would have been attempted on sound and liberal principles, alike favourable to the resources of the state, and to the private wealth of the people, in which alone the foundations of public revenue can be surely laid ; but that here again we are disappointed : that his Royal Highness's advisers, with the evidence before their eyes of trade sinking under the pressure of taxes, and the income of the state constantly declining, as the difficulties of the people increase and their industry decays, seem resolved to defer the settlement of the Finances, as if they waited for some opportunity of restoring the Income Tax, which we trusted that our vote of that session had for ever destroyed : nor is it amongst the least of the grievances whereof we complain, that, while the deficiency of the revenue is acknowledged, no effectual steps are taken to reduce the public expenditure, which is kept upon the footing of former wars in order to support unprecedented military establishments, equally strange to the habits, ruinous to the wealth, and fatal to the liberties of the country :

"That, while the measures of his Royal Highness's advisers at home are calculated to afford no relief either to the labouring finances of the state, or the insupportable sufferings of our countrymen, we regret to observe, that a course of policy has been pursued towards foreign states, at once injurious to the prosperity, and degrading to the character of the nation : on the one hand we see, with humiliation, that all the blood and treasure so lavishly bestowed, and all the triumphs of our arms, have failed to secure to us the most ordinary share of influence with the very powers which owe their existence to our efforts, while, on the other, we perceive with shame and disgust the authority of the British name prostituted to sanction every abuse of power ; every invasion of national independence ; every incroachment upon popular rights ; and that lately we have witnessed, nearly at the same time, the humbling sight of British merchants oppressed, without the hopes of redress, by a petty tyrant whom our influence had raised to power, and an authorized British Minister joining in the bootless persecution of an unoffending individual, for the purpose of courting more powerful sovereigns :

"That it is a further consequence of the same false principles, and the same imbecility, which mark the administration of our foreign affairs, that laying down no certain line of conduct respecting the intercourse with South America, but swayed by the groundless prejudices against colonial rights, which have survived the first American war, his Royal Highness's advisers have succeeded in disconcerting the commercial plans of our own countrymen, and in exciting the universal distrust of the independent party, while they have failed in giving satisfaction to the Spanish and Portuguese Governments: nor can we refrain from lamenting, that, after the unparalleled sacrifices made to preserve the existence of those dynasties, it should be found impossible to obtain from them a renunciation of the execrable traffic in human flesh, carried on by their authority, to an extent beyond all former example, and very far surpassing, in its repugnance to the law of nations, the French aggressions against themselves, which we interfered to repel:

"That when indeed we recollect the prodigious efforts made by this country during the late contest, and contemplate the intolerable burdens which they have entailed upon all classes of his Royal Highness's subjects, however gratifying may be the reflection, that the triumphs of our arms exalted the character of the British nation, it is truly painful to mark the truth which every day's experience forces upon our belief, that the fruit of those costly victories hath been thrown away by the incapacity of his Royal Highness's confidential advisers: even the arrangement of the continent, which they claimed as their own, and boasted would be permanent, offers no prospect of stability to counterbalance the narrowness of the principles on which it was founded, and the profligacy of the means by which it was effected: for, besides the weakness naturally inherent in every such transaction, and the universal discontent of the people, whose interests have been sacrificed to it, we observe the greater continental powers rather extending their armaments than returning to peaceable pursuits; the inferior sovereigns striving to follow their example; and leagues of a mysterious nature, with unexplained views, taking place of the ancient and known relations between friendly states, while Great Britain, instead of trusting for her influence to the weight of her high character, the popularity of pure and liberal principle, the knowledge of her commanding resources, and above all the incalculable effect of her entire disinterestedness, has been involved in all the intrigues of foreign courts, has submitted to take her rank among them as a second-rate military power, and adopted a system of constant intermeddling, beneath her dignity, as it is destructive of her authority; and that we observe with astonishment and regret, that in order still more effectually to insure the failure of such schemes, their execution has in many instances been entrusted to incapable hands, according to the novel and reprehensible plan, which seems to be followed, of bestowing the higher patronage of the Foreign Department upon persons recommended by family connection or by military rank, and rewarding with its inferior posts the basest species of political service:

"But that when we turn from surveying the effects of mismanagement upon our national wealth and our influence abroad, to contemplate the blows which have been sustained by the civil and religious liberties of his Royal Highness's faithful subjects, we are filled with a concern so much the deeper, by how much those interests are inestimably dearer to a free people: that to serve the unworthy purposes of a court intrigue, for diminishing the influence of some distinguished men, and widening the difference that unhappily divides others from his Royal Highness's confidence, we have seen the attempt, already partially successful, to revive the senseless clamours of a misguided multitude against his Royal Highness's Roman Catholic subjects, and to embody, as the principle of the Government, those bigotted doctrines, which, after weakening the strength of the Empire in war, occasion the necessity for a standing army, that exhausts its resources and undermines its liberties in peace: nor is it one class of his Royal Highness's subjects alone who have to lament the injury to their constitutional rights which this fatal session has brought about: that the measures so disastrous to public liberty, which his Royal Highness's advisers have prevailed upon Parliament to sanction, are all the answer that has been given to the petitions of the people; all the return made for their unalterable attachment to the Constitution; all the means taken to justify or fulfil their anxious expectations: that on the eve of a prorogation, which will leave, for the first time since the revolution, the most precious of their rights at the absolute disposal of those advisers, we deem it our duty, alike towards his suffering but faithful subjects, and towards his Royal Highness, solemnly to desire that so vast and perilous a trust be no wise abused: that when we consider into whose keeping the personal freedom of each individual in the kingdom is delivered, and reflect that among the confidential servants of his Royal Highness, are to be found both those who exercised the powers of Government in Ireland during the darkest period of her history, those whose general incapacity has been recorded by their colleagues, and those whom recent proceedings have stamped as inadequate to contend with the wiles of their own agents, we may well be alarmed at the prospect of the approaching recess; but we deem it a sacred duty not to separate without expressing our earnest expectation, that his Royal Highness will discountenance, by all means, the employment of persons pretending to be spies, and in reality contrivers of sedition for the sake of gain, the encouragement of whose unworthy artifices must end in the destruction of innocent individuals, endanger the public tranquillity, and irretrievably alienate the affections of his faithful subjects: and that we pledge ourselves to institute a rigorous inquiry at the beginning of the next session into every thing that concerns the execution of the new laws during the prorogation of Parliament."

Lord Castlereagh began with observing, that after the speech delivered by the hon. and learned gentleman, and the address which he had thought proper to submit to the consideration of the House, he felt himself entitled to trespass for some time on their indulgence. If the object of the hon. and learned gentleman indeed had been deliberation, and not inflammation, his speech would have been unnecessary; for one part of it consisted of statements which formed a proper ground of inquiry, and another of assertions, which, if true, ought long since to have led to an impeachment. But the hon. and learned gentleman had not stated either to be his object on this occasion; and he could not but think it singular, that he should have occupied himself the whole session in preparing an extended pamphlet, in the shape of a speech, and embracing a considerable quantity of libellous matter which he had reserved, not much to the credit of his generosity or candour, to be directed against him and his friends on the last day of the session. (Hear, hear.) It was only the day before that he had been given to understand that the intention of the hon. and learned gentleman had been merely to place his proposed address upon record, without going into any elaborate review of the foreign and domestic situation of the country. He disdained to accept the assurances of the hon. and learned gentleman's liberality towards either him, or those who were dear to him, although he relied confidently on the liberality of the House. It was his wish, not only to protect himself, but Parliament from that system of running it down of which they had that night witnessed so conspicuous an instance. A more opprobrious or unjust reflection could not be thrown on the character of Parliament, than to declare that it had been insensible to the distresses of the people. Every man with whom public duty was the basis of conduct, must admit, that the attention of Parliament had been directed to this subject with a diligence unexampled; with the most lively sympathy; and had led not only to the most useful investigations, but to measures of the greatest practical utility. It was true, that Parliament had been called together at a moment of general suffering; and without referring here to the direct steps taken for alleviating it, he must contend, that those measures which were reprobated as an invasion of liberty had afforded substantial relief in protecting the honest and the industrious against those who sought to make a pretended reform the instrument and means of disturbing the public peace. (Hear, hear.) These were the proceedings which had sustained the confidence of the country, and enabled the man who loved it to labour for the support of his family without dreading the dagger of the assassin. Parliament, he repeated, would have acted the part of a driveller, if it had listened at such a time to the hon. and learned gentleman's projects of reform. The difference between his views on this subject, and those of the hon. and learned gentleman, proceeded probably from the different grounds on which they were formed. He considered the honourable and learned gentleman as desirous of introducing changes into the practice of the constitution of a revolutionary nature. His own principle, on the contrary, was, that it would be dangerous to yield to any but gradual improvement, arising from, and dictated by, experience. The hon. and learned gentleman contemplated as desirable, or at least favoured, the progress of alterations which he was satisfied would subvert instead of maintaining or improving the constitution. The salutary operation of the policy pursued by Parliament was manifested not only in the increasing value of the funds, which in the course of the session had arisen from 62 to 79, but in that of every other description of property. There never, in fact, was a session during which the wisdom embodied in Parliament had been more successfully applied in devising the means of practical relief to evils of great magnitude and extent; or at the close of which more triumphant evidence of it was disclosed. (Hear, hear.) Nothing but a perverted mind, or an uncandid spirit towards Parliament, could induce any one to regard their proceedings as indicative of any hostility to the liberties of the people. But had the hon. and learned gentleman, who, at a former period of the session, had read to the House another elaborate pamphlet on the miserable state of the country, ever started one rational idea, or submitted a single plan, for the diminution of the public burdens? No; but his constant complaint was, that nothing had been done; and that the establishment was not lowered. This assertion was repeated, notwithstanding the labours of the Finance Committee, to whom Government considered themselves as under great obligations; and although the establishment had been reduced from 20 to 18,000,000*l.* a reduction larger than had been anticipated by the most rigid criticism. Was this a proof that nothing had been done? Or was the proof to be found in the Report presented from the Committee appointed to examine the best means of improving the state of the poor-laws, an inquiry so difficult and so extensive? If it had been found impossible to prepare and digest a better system in so short a time, the issue of Exchequer bills, for the purpose of giving employment to the poor, shewed that Parliament had exerted itself to supply immediate relief to the distress of the lower classes. The hon. and learned gentleman appeared to have assumed the disguise of a dissertation on our commercial policy, for the purpose of making an exclusive attack upon his public character. He did not believe that his object was inquiry, because if it was, he must give him credit for the ability to carry it into execution. He had taken the opportunity of animadverting on the proceedings of Congress, and of the Allied Powers, subsequently; and it was no matter of surprise, considering the anxiety with which some persons had watched over the fate and fortunes of a certain family, that those who had achieved their overthrow should be the objects of suspicion and obloquy to them. But with reference to our commercial policy, he must deny that his right hon. friend (Mr. Robinson) had ever supported the abstract principle of a system of exclusion. All he had maintained was, that we could not adopt such liberal principles as it was desirable that the world should act on generally, whilst the system of protection and counter-protection was maintained in other countries; that a more enlarged policy must be progressive and mutual, and could not be adopted per saltum, as the hon. and learned gentleman appeared to think. Had he, however, proposed an inquiry into any particular branch of the system, he would undertake to say that it would not have been refused. He now came, certainly labouring under great disadvantages, to notice in detail those charges which were personal to himself or to those who were dear to him; and he must declare that he saw nothing in the hon. and learned gentleman's mode of treating this subject which called upon him to view it in the light of grace, or courtesy, or liberality. His description of the alleged cruelties which had been practised during the administration in Ireland, of which he had been a member, ought long since to have been made the foundation of an impeachment, if they were believed to be true, and not have been reserved to be brought forward in a strain of black, malignant, and libellous insinuation on the last day of a session. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham spoke to order, and submitted, that these were expressions which were not consistent with the decorum and dignity of their proceedings. He considered that the noble lord was exceeding the usual license of parliamentary language.

Lord Castlereagh insisted that the hon. and learned gentleman had employed insinuations which he was bound to expose and to repel.

Mr. Bennet spoke to order, and contended, that nothing had fallen from his hon. and learned friend which could justify the noble lord's asperity of observation.

Mr. Canning apprehended, that there was no doubt that the word libellous was strictly applicable to whatever was said in Parliament which, in the case of its being printed, would constitute a libel.

Mr. Brougham admitted that his reflections on the noble lord's conduct called for explanation from him, and even excused some warmth in the conduct of his defence.

Lord Castlereagh resumed. He would not shrink from asserting that the expressions of the hon. and learned gentleman, applied on the last day of the session to transactions which took place 30 years ago, were unjust to individuals, prejudicial to the public service, and calculated to lend countenance to the machinations of traitors. He must protest against another abuse of the privilege of speech in the hon. and learned gentleman's observations with regard to Genoa, nor could ministers be responsible for our foreign relations under such a perversion of the purposes of that House. He would maintain, in opposition to the hon. and learned gentleman, that nothing was more strongly to be deprecated than the policy which he recommended, of the greater powers making use of their influence to force commercial regulations on weaker states. It would be an equally unjust and unsound principle of commercial intercourse for this country to aim at the establishment of a distinct cast of British merchants in foreign states, enjoying particular exemptions, instead of those reciprocal advantages which were essential to the rights and interests of every people. He would zealously maintain the privileges of our merchants, in conformity with subsisting treaties; but he never would adopt the hollow, despotic, and illiberal policy—a policy directly contrary to every principle of national law—of extorting concessions of mercantile advantage by means of political superiority. If there was anything on which he could undertake to justify himself, to the House and to the country, it was with respect to the policy which had been pursued towards Spain and South America. His Majesty's ministers had nothing to reproach themselves with on that subject. If the hon. and learned gentleman meant that the country had not the same commerce with South America that it ever had, he denied the statements in which the hon. and learned gentleman had indulged himself. He firmly believed that the country had nothing left to desire with that portion of the world. Did the hon. and learned gentleman mean to say, that he would have been able to effect any course of policy by which South America would have been more friendly to the interests of Great Britain? On the contrary, he was afraid that much injury had been done, not only by the hon. and learned gentleman, but by others, from the speeches which had been made in that House. The hon. and learned gentleman, with the peculiar feelings which he displayed on several occasions, had stated, that all personal liberty had been invaded; but he (Lord C.) could only say, that those individuals who consulted the best interests of the nation essentially differed from him. In his opinion, the hon. and learned gentleman was a very bad guardian of the liberties of Europe. The Duke of Wellington had acted precisely as the treaties intended he should act. He never heard any impeachment of the conduct of that great captain; and regretted no less than he was surprised, to hear the hon.

and learned gentleman say, that we were trying to manage our affairs rather by military than by civil operations. He begged leave to say, that all those who regarded the welfare and tranquillity of Europe had acted with nothing more than a becoming precaution; they had merely entertained those ordinary jealousies which existing circumstances so imperiously demanded. The hon. and learned gentleman had talked a great deal of that individual (Lucien Buonaparte) who had devoted himself so much to literary pursuits; but it did so happen that that individual, had been the instrument of placing Buonaparté in power at an early period, and had enabled him to attain that supreme authority which he afterwards exercised to the destruction of the peace and welfare of all other parts of the world. He believed, that his intention afterwards was to enable that great destroyer of all public and private happiness to obtain complete dominion. If, therefore, we had suffered those individuals to traverse the world at their pleasure, we should not have availed ourselves of all those benefits to which our entry into Paris so justly entitled us. It was a fixed principle of our alliance with the other powers, that we should not suffer them to go abroad without keeping our eyes upon them, in order that Europe might observe their machinations. This was a policy which none who regarded the tranquillity of the world could venture to blame. If the hon. and learned gentleman supposed that the particular individual to whom he had alluded did nothing more than make verses in Italy, he was greatly mistaken. He had gone on, in confederacy with others, to assist and promote the views of those who were resident in America. He (Lord C.) was not at all ashamed to say, that he should at all times adhere to that policy. With respect to the present situation of Europe, and the continuance of the peace which so happily existed, he thought that the House might look to the speech from the throne on that subject. The system of Europe was that of a very extensive armament: and how could it be useful or politic for her to confide in slumbers, and not to expect to be awakened some morning by circumstances which had so often invaded her peace? If any one could protect the world against the danger of being disturbed by reformists and revolutionists, they would be entitled to demand those reductions which the most sanguine admirers of economy could require. He assured the hon. and learned gentleman, that he wished to leave the conduct of other powers entirely to their own judgment; but he believed that it was an advantageous circumstance for the liberties of Europe, that a British corps was mixed with the troops of the other nations.—With respect to the appointment of Lord Cathcart and Lord Stewart, he contended, that the circumstances of the war had rendered it necessary to employ general officers in the character of diplomats; if Government had sent out civilians from this country, still nine tenths of the official transactions must have been conducted by military persons, and, therefore, the only result would have been an augmentation of influence, without any advantage to the public service. If Lord Cathcart and Lord Stewart had been appointed in a time of full peace, he felt that the comments of the hon. and learned gentleman would have applied with considerable weight. As to Lord Stewart, he trusted that he was not so blinded by his partiality to a brother whom he loved, as to overlook any deficiency, if it existed; but though not actually brought up in that line, it was but justice to assert his strong sense and powers of reason, and the considerable experience he had in those matters.—To come to another point, the character of Reynolds, he had never heard any thing which militated against him, except his having been engaged in a rebellion, for which he afterwards made sufficient atonement. He had never heard any thing against his moral character, except in as far as he had stated, which could render him unfit to be employed in a colony, where the salary was only 200*l.* a year. Mr. Reynolds gave all his information to Government before he (Lord C.) came into office. He gave it to Mr. Pelham anterior to that period, and he knew nothing of Mr. Reynolds till after he was held worthy of credit, not only by a jury, but by the Irish House of Commons: the hon. gentleman might think that he ought to be disgraced, but that was not the universal feeling of the world. Lord Chichester thought so well of him, that when the British army was in Portugal, he deemed him worthy of the office of Postmaster-General. Mr. Reynolds, therefore, was not considered by Lord Chichester as a base character—he was not so considered by the corporation of Dublin. The guild of merchants so little concurred in the outcries against him, that they voted the freedom to him, as a man who had rendered considerable services to his country. It was upon the truth of his evidence that no less than fifty-three traitors pleaded guilty, and implored the mercy of the crown; it was upon his information that that nest of traitors, that body of vipers, was brought to public justice. So far, then, Mr. Reynolds had assisted in the execution and administration of the laws; so far he had served his country. His present appointment was that of Consul at Iceland; and he sincerely believed that he sought it to obtain some repose, and close his life in peace.—With respect to Mr. Manners he knew nothing of him; but that he was recommended as a proper person to be employed under Government, and was therefore appointed to an office of 200*l.* a year at Massachusetts. He did not know that Mr. Manners had been engaged in any literary work whatever. He left the appointment to Mr. Hamilton, who found Mr. Manners a well educated man, and perfectly qualified for the situation. The hon. and learned gentleman had placed his objections on the ground of seeing Mr. Manners brought before the Court of King's Bench in 1812. This was a transaction that occurred five years ago; at which time Mr. Manners was a student, and applied to be called to the bar. The benchers of Lincoln's-inn refused to admit him until the whole case had been examined, when a letter was written by the present Attorney-General to Mr. Manners. The letter stated, that the Attorney-General perfectly remembered the case of Mr. Finnerty v. Manners. (In mentioning this case, said the noble lord, I do hereby disclaim any personal feelings. On a recent occasion, I felt myself bound to call Mr. Finnerty to a court of justice, for what he said respecting me; but, I now declare, that nothing but a deep sense of the duty which I owed to the public could on any account have induced me to prosecute that action.) In that letter, the Attorney-General said, that Mr. Finnerty was libelled, but that the Chief Justice thought the action brought by Mr. Finnerty was most improper, and, therefore, the jury had given only six-pence damages. Mr. Manners was accordingly admitted by the Benchers, and therefore if he was fit to be a lawyer, he was fit to be a consul.—The only other appointment was that of a gentleman at Genoa. Now, he had known that individual for a great many years; and a more respectable person did not exist on the face of the earth. The House had then been told that the country could never be safe or happy, until the claims of the Roman Catholics were acceded to; he (Lord C.) wished to see that question settled; but he must observe, that if he were a Catholic he should feel very little obliged to the hon. gentleman for the angry feelings which he had now endeavoured to excite against the most zealous promoters of that cause. With respect to Ireland, he conceded that he was guilty of the inexpressible offence (as it would doubtless ever appear in the eyes of the hon. and learned gentleman) of having prevented the separation of that part of the empire, and of having assisted the efforts of the loyal population of Ireland against the conspiracy of rebels and traitors; but he was satisfied that none who were acquainted with his disposition could accuse him of cruelty; and if cruelties and atrocities were perpetrated at that period (a fact which he did not deny), the blood which had been spilt was on the head of those who had encouraged and sanctioned that guilty and unnatural rebellion. At that eventful period, the loyal were a persecuted party, and they struggled with such arms as nature and resentment gave them, to save themselves from attacks on their lives and property. It was not to be wondered that, in the exercise of self-defence and justly excited anger, they should be carried beyond the strict bounds of discretion or mercy, and that in the heat of the struggle Government had no power to repress their loyal indignation. But it was most invidious and unmanly at this distance of time, when every individual who had then conducted himself ill might so long since have been brought to punishment if he deserved it, to stand up as the advocate of those whom Government; if it chose, might have consigned long since to the lash of the law. How could any man who had sat silent during the last 20 years now rise up and expatiate on facts which, if true, ought to have been, and would have been, long since the subject of impeachment. It was unmanly thus to countenance that spirit of calumny out of doors which had long prevailed on this subject, though without any just foundation.—He felt he had been led into a subject too extensive for the House to follow him through, and complained that the hon. and learned gentleman had, on the last day of the session, brought forward this motion, almost without notice, for the sake of entering a protest, as he called it, to rescue his honourable name from the disgrace which he chose to attach to the proceedings of the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham explained. The prosecution to which he had alluded was not that of Finnerty against Manners, but of the King, on the prosecution of Hallet, against Manners. In the latter case, it appeared, that it was the constant habit of the defendant to attack individuals, and to proceed in his calumnies, unless bought off.

Sir F. Burdett said, he should not have risen, had it not been for some remarks which the noble lord had thought fit to make in the course of his speech. Whatever difference of opinion might exist on other subjects, and on the general conduct of Ministers, during the session, every one must agree, that the most important feature of the noble lord's speech, was the character he had thought fit to give of Reynolds, and his defence of the general employment of spies by Government. Now, if the noble lord had made a much less eloquent or impressive statement, he should not have been surprised at his being carried through all difficulties. There was a sort of sympathy between the Treasury Bench and majorities in that House, which was always sure to bring off a person speaking on that side, however he might be implicated. Indeed, he thought there must be something operative in the materials of the bench itself, which, however rude originally, seemed to have been so manufactured as to carry with them a most potent spell. If the bench could speak, it might explain the fact.

"Olim truncus eram ficulneus, inutile lignum:
"Maluit esse Deum."—

But he did not think it could proceed to say,

"Deus inde ego, furum aviumque
"Maxima formido."

It was absurd to state that a silence of 20 years had been observed on the affairs of Ireland. The atrocities perpetrated in that country had been a constant theme of animadversion in the House; and he remembered, that at the very time they were taking place, it had been declared by Parliament highly inconsistent with the letter and spirit of our constitution, to inflict torture for the purpose of arriving at confession. The noble lord was by no means correct in asserting that a silence of 20 years had been observed on this subject. But had there been a silence of 20 or 40 years, that could afford no bar to an accusation against the guilty. But the most remarkable thing that had fallen from the noble lord was his panegyric on the infamous Reynolds. One would suppose, from his language, that they were "all honourable men," Castle, Oliver, Reynolds, and all of them; though the noble lord, it seemed, knew nothing of Reynolds, but that he had brought his associates to justice. However, there was no need of declamation; a simple statement of facts was the strongest condemnation of this individual that could be urged. This Thomas Reynolds, late on the grand jury that found the bill against Watson, was, in the year 1798, an informer in Ireland against the very persons with whom he had conspired against the Government. He prosecuted several of his fellow delinquents, and on their trial the prisoners called many witnesses, who proved that Reynolds was a man of infamous character, and not to be credited on his oath. Mr. Valentine O'Connor, a merchant of great wealth and high character, deposed on the trial of Oliver Bond, that Reynolds was so bad a man he could not be credited on his oath, and this he had a good opportunity of knowing, as he was nearly connected with him by marriage. Major Witherington, and Captain Witherington, whose sister Reynolds married, stated, there was no doubt of his having administered poison to his mother-in-law; that he had robbed her private drawer of several hundred pounds, and that he had a skeleton key capable of opening any door; such as, in this country, is commonly termed a picklock. Thomas Warrin, who was a partner of Reynolds's mother, in a manufacturing concern, had detected Reynolds in robbing their warehouse several times, and affirmed, that he was not entitled to be credited on his oath. Reynolds himself, when asked by counsel whether these facts were true, did not attempt to dispute them, but put a bold face on the matter; and confessed he had made use of the produce of these thefts to support a woman whom he had in keeping. (Hear.) He was at that time a poor and distressed individual, but had since grown rich on the bounties and pension afforded by government. These circumstances had nothing to do with Reynolds's being engaged with the rebels, and shewed an innate ~~corruption~~ ^{corruption} entirely unconnected with political offences. That the noble lord should not have heard of these things at the time, was most surprising; but that, having since heard them, he should say Reynolds was a moral character, and a person ~~deserving~~ ^{deserving} to be encouraged by government, was a statement that he could not ~~illegally~~ ^{illegally} induce that House to adopt. Whatever the noble lord might insinuate as to unmanly or invidious proceedings, he would not be able to persuade those who had been tortured, to be silent at any distance of time. But this Reynolds had not been brought into notice by others; he had not been dragged to the light by the hand of justice; his exposure was owing entirely to himself. He was living here in splendour, and chose to be put on the grand jury that found the bill against Watson. If there was any culpability, according to the noble lord's theory, in bringing him to notice, he had no one to thank but himself; though it was impossible that any one who knew his character should forbear animadverting on it. This was so infamous, that lawyers doubted whether a bill found by him would be good: for a grand jury ought to be probi et legales homines, and if any one of them did not answer that description, such a circumstance would vitiate the indictment. What he had stated it was impossible for any one to contradict; persons were ready to prove the whole at the bar of the House; and it was to be found reported in all the trials of that period. Were we, then, to be told by the noble lord, that Reynolds was to be held up as a moral character, and could any one avoid feeling disgust at the employment of such agents by government? When he traced a number of the persons who had lately been exciting disturbances to the offices of the Secretary of State, could we avoid feeling indignant at the means employed by ministers for effecting a suspension of the liberty of the subject? His hon. and learned friend had said, with great propriety, that instead of alleviating the distresses and calamities under which the country labours, ministers had—he could not say suspended, but—destroyed the liberties of the nation. He repeated, they had destroyed our liberties; for it would have been infinitely preferable that they should have erased from the statute-book the law which ensures those liberties; that they should at once have repealed the Habeas Corpus Act, rather than have procured the passing a law which gives them more arbitrary power than the most arbitrary government that ever existed. Again, he must revert to the means by which they had procured that law. Here the hon. baronet referred to the case of a printer, who was applied to for the purpose of striking off some inflammatory hand-bills, which he was ordered to direct to one Nichols, living in Bennett-street, Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road. The printer very prudently went to the office of the Secretary of State to give information of the circumstance, and while he was there a person came in, who seemed quite in authority and acquainted with all the officers. But what was his surprise some little time afterwards, at finding that this man was the very individual residing in Bennett-street. He (Sir F. B.) did not say that there was not a great portion of discontent in the country; he knew there was: but he could not conceive how the fact should be otherwise, under all the distress and pressure of the times, and the great corruption of that House. He believed, however, there was no disposition to treason; but if there was, it was the work of Government alone; and when the noble lord was pleased to accuse him of encouraging traitors, he must say, that in reality it was the noble lord who encouraged traitors—traitors who ought forthwith to be brought to trial, though in the employment of the noble lord. The noble lord might say he knew nothing of Reynolds, or Mannors, who was the most detestable private libeller in the country; but he (Sir F.) said they were traitors, and that he had whole heaps of letters concerning the detestable conduct of the last-mentioned individual. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord might smile, but no person except the noble lord could smile at the vile and abject servitude of those who were removed from prison to prison, from one solitary dungeon to another, at the beck of the noble lord and his colleagues. The noble lord, indeed, might smile at the mention of such tortures, and after the scenes he had gone through in Ireland might think them lenient. After such transactions it was little to be wondered at, that the noble lord should be found transferring men like cattle from one despot to another, (for, notwithstanding all the noble lord might say, he would speak out, and would call despots despots), or taking credit to himself for a deliberate violation of the law of nations. But to return nearer home. Perhaps the noble lord would find an order for the spies he had employed; and as the torturer Fitzgerald had been made a baronet, a Grand Cross would perhaps be bestowed on Reynolds; for he had also been employed in an office of trust, and was at one time in the control of the post-office at Lisbon. If, however, the noble lord would continue to employ such agents, he would do well to keep them at least out of sight, and to avoid disgusting the world with panegyrics on characters so odious. All the best writers, ancient and modern, and among the latter, Mr. Burke and Montesquieu *, had laid it down, that the employment of spies was a never-failing characteristic of an arbitrary and vicious Government; and though the noble lord might be content, like the Roman emperor, to say of the people, "Oderint dum metuant," yet he might recollect, or reflection might teach him, that "firmisimum imperium quo obediētes gaudent," and that a government could have no real stability but in the affections of its subjects. If we were to have a standing army, if we were to have a military government (an apprehension which was now pretty fully realized, for nothing was to be seen but soldiery in all directions), there was indeed the greatest apprehension that every thing was at the mercy of the Executive; and that was a situation which could not be endured by any who had a generous mind. To lose our liberty at the will of another, was a situation little better than death; but it was much worse to stand in hourly danger of solitary confinement at the caprice or malice of a Minister of State; to be cut off from all friends and acquaintance, and to leave them in utter ignorance of our fate. He had presented the petition that night of a man who had been 17 weeks in prison; who had been taken up, ironed, and conveyed to Lancaster gaol, for no other reason but because he had been promoting a petition for Reform in Parliament. If this were treason, let Ministers declare it so at once, and let us no longer be duped by the empty sound of allegiance to the King. To whomsoever Ministers thought that allegiance due, at least they ought explicitly to declare, and clearly shew, the rule by which, in future, we were to hold our lives and liberties. The most arbitrary tyrant that ever existed could not be guilty of the gross injustice of punishment for offences which had never been declared to be such.—Let Ministers then proclaim, that it should be high treason to promote Reform in Parliament, and we should know at once what we had to trust to.—The hon. baronet concluded, with observing, that his hon. and learned friend's motion would not have been brought forward on the last day of the session, unless Ministers had themselves thought fit to hasten the prorogation; and that he had repeatedly given them notice of his intention, so that the noble lord had no right to complain on that ground. There were, indeed, many motions yet undisposed of, and, in particular, one of his, (respecting Mr. Mallison's invention of a life-boat), which had been driven off from day to day, and which he was now prevented from bringing forward; so that there was great reason to complain that the session had been improperly hurried to a close. But his main object in rising that evening was, to contradict the assertions made in favour of the character of Reynolds, the informer.

The Attorney-General said, he was quite acquainted with Mr. Reynolds, but thought he had been unfairly dealt by. When Mr. Reynolds was a witness on the trials alluded to in Ireland, all the attacks now made on him were brought forward to induce the juries not to believe his testimony; but, after the fullest investigation of the circumstances of the case, his veracity was confirmed before three different juries, and on his evidence principally the persons tried were convicted of the offences of which they were accused. Afterwards, on his evidence at the bar of the House of Commons, bills of attainder were agreed to. Thus had Mr. Reynolds's character passed through a very fiery ordeal without injury; unless the verdict of juries were not to be attended to when they convicted, but only when they acquitted the persons charged before them. The great fault of Mr. Reynolds was, his having entered into the conspiracy, for which he afterwards made ample atonement. He (the Attorney-General) was one of those perverted beings who did not think that it was criminal in a man to come forward, and make an atonement for a previous offence. So far from thinking such conduct a crime, he was one of those wrong-headed persons who called it a virtue. As to the appointment of Mr. Reynolds on the grand jury, Government, or the law-officers, knew no more of it than the hon. and learned gentleman himself. He had been informed, that on Mr. Reynolds' being summoned on the grand jury, he was anxious to get rid of the burthen, and asserted, that he ought to be excused on the ground of his being appointed a consul to a foreign state; but this was refused by the summoning officer. Mr. Reynolds was no spy of Government. He was not at all employed in Ireland. But being a man originally engaged in a traitorous conspiracy, repenting his crime, and foreseeing the horrid consequences to which it would lead, he atoned by disclosing all that he knew on the subject. With respect to Castle, he denied that, during the transaction, which was the subject of the late trial, he was a spy employed by Government. Nay, he was a man of whose existence Government was utterly ignorant, until long after the transaction itself. It was not until a considerable time after the 2d of December, that a single individual, high or low, connected with Government, was aware that such a person as Castle existed. He had nothing to do with Castle's general character; but he had stated facts, and without wishing to comment on the verdict of the jury, he thought, and should think as long as he lived, that the law-officers of the Crown would not have been justified had they not put the persons on their trials who had recently been acquitted. Adverting to the case of Mr. Mannors, he repeated the statement which the noble lord had made on the subject of the trial of that gentleman for libel. Was it because a man wrote an angry answer to an attack made upon him, that, however erroneous he might be in doing so, his character was to suffer, unless it could be shewn that his moral feeling was impeached? If such attacks as those which had been made on Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Mannors were listened to, there was no man, however honourable, who had political enemies, that might not be so assailed by affidavits and similar statements. The hon. baronet had said, that the employment of spies and informers was a system of a tyrannical Government. This might be a very convenient doctrine for those who were so enemies to conspiracy and treason. It would be very convenient for persons who were engaged in any criminal plot, to establish that he who was a spy, a partisan, or an informer, ought never to be believed.

* "Should I be asked whether there is any necessity for spies in monarchies, my answer would be, that the usual practice of good princes is not to employ them. The trade of a spy might perhaps be tolerable, were it practised by honest men; but the necessary infamy of the person is sufficient to make us judge of the infamy of the thing." (Spirit of Laws). For Mr. Burke's opinions on this subject, see p. 1406.

ple, impunity would be established for all kinds of guilt. He allowed that the testimony of such an individual ought to be received with great caution, but when confirmed by that of other witnesses, and by the circumstances of the case, to reject it would be to grant an indemnity to crime.

Lord Castlereagh, in explanation, observed, that both the libels for which Mr. Mannors had been prosecuted, had been before the Benchers when they considered his case; but that they had determined that there was nothing in them which impeached either his moral character or his conduct as a gentleman; and they had therefore ordered that he should be called to the bar.

Mr. Bennett said, that he could not listen to the declaration of the noble lord, that those who differed from him on this subject were abettors of treason and malignant calumniators, without repelling the accusation with all the scorn which it merited. As long as he had a seat in that House, he would exercise his right to inquire into the conduct of our Government.—With reference to the surrender of Genoa to Austria, and the transfer of Upper Saxony, he could not remember without indignation and shame the share which our Government had in those infamous transactions; and he was persuaded, that although the votes of that House might carry the noble lord through at present, future historians would represent those transactions as blots and stains on the administration of the noble lord, and on the character of the Parliament by which they had been sanctioned. The noble lord had said much about his own feelings, and, for himself, he had no doubt that the noble lord had a kind heart; but certainly if the Irish Government had not encouraged the horrible practices so often alluded to in the course of the evening, they had winked at them. When he looked, therefore, at the power given by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and considered to whom it was given, he was filled with alarm at the recollection of the cruelties that had taken place under a similar superintendence. The noble lord had certainly identified himself with some of the worst proceedings in Ireland, by his having consented to make Mr. Suckling Fitzgerald, a baronet. It was to prostitute the honour, thus to bestow it on a man against whom he could not find terms sufficiently forcible to express his indignation. He intimated several cases to prove the cruelties of which he had been guilty. One was of a school-master who had been flogged because a French note was found on him; although when that note came afterwards to be translated, it turned out to be merely the apology of a French teacher for non-attendance! He had in his hand two depositions to acts of a similar kind. One was the affidavit of John Clare, of Essex-street, Dublin, merchant-taylor, sworn on the 31st of October, 1810, and stating, that in the memorable year 1798 a number of floggings, half hangings, &c. took place at the Royal Exchange, immediately adjoining the Castle Gates, at the Lower Castle-yard, at the Barracks, at Essex Bridge, &c. all of which must have been known to the noble lord opposite. Among other things the deponent declared, that he had seen men pitched and tarred, and hunted through the streets, on whom torture was afterwards inflicted. Another affidavit was from Timothy Brophy, who deposed, that in 1798 he had been offered a commission to give information; but that, having no information to give, he had been tortured. He was stripped naked, tied hands and feet, and whipped to the amount of 100 lashes. His raw back was then rubbed with salt and gunpowder, and the whipping was renewed until he became insensible. They had heard a great deal about the excellent moral character of Reynolds. He was the last man in the world to wish to attack the character of individuals, or to drag them unnecessarily before the public. He would admit, too, that under the circumstances of the rebellion in Ireland, it was perhaps the bounden duty of the administration of that country to avail themselves of the evidence of such persons as Reynolds. But when speaking of the character of such a person, it was always to be remembered, that he had sworn a solemn oath to the United Irishmen—he had sworn a solemn oath to be true to them, and that he afterwards turned round and swore away the lives of those persons to whom he had thus sworn to be true. But it was said his character had been completely white-washed—that he was quite regenerated—that his conduct subsequent to that time had been most exemplary, and that all that he stated on the trials of the United Irishmen had been established by the most undoubted authorities. All that Reynolds stated at the trials of Oliver Bond and others might be perfectly true. But the circumstance of his being believed by juries at these trials did not necessarily establish his character. There were many instances of men having been believed by juries, who were not on that account considered less infamous characters. The evidence of Dugdale and others (in the Popish plot) was not only believed by juries, but even by the House of Peers. But were the characters of these persons attempted to be set up, because juries and the House of Peers believed their evidence? (Hear, hear.) Would any person attempt to set up Castle—would he be less the bully of a brothel—would he be less the person who was guilty of forging bank-notes, if his evidence had been believed by a jury, as it happened not to be believed? This man had been before employed by Government as a spy, though it had been stated that Government knew nothing of him till a considerable time after the transaction of the 2d of December. He could not, however, believe that the Secretary of State for the Home Department was ignorant of it. He happened to know that the noble lord at the head of the Home Department, and the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, knew of this. A letter was written to the Noble Secretary, informing him of this man having appeared as a spy. For transactions in which he was implicated he would have been convicted in a Court below; but he was brought up to the Court of King's Bench by a certiorari by Lord Ellenborough. As this was a Government spy, he was not to be punished, but rewarded—he was kept till another opportunity, that he might again be let loose on the public. He knew that the noble Secretary of State for the Home Department was acquainted with this by a letter from a magistrate; and therefore, when a right hon. gentleman said that Government knew nothing of him till a considerable period after the transactions respecting which he gave evidence, from the courtesy due from one member to another, he was bound to say, he believed that the right hon. gentleman knew nothing of the circumstance in question; but the noble lord (Sidmouth) knew about it from the correspondence with the magistrate; and Castle was known to Government as one of the most wicked and profligate characters ever let loose on the world. (Hear, hear, hear.) They could therefore no more disclaim their connection with this man, than they could with their new protégé Oliver. He was entitled to think, that the employment of spies and informers reflected discredit on the Government. When the affairs of a country went on smoothly, a Government was always very willing to take credit for the circumstance; and certainly on the other hand discredit was due to a Government, when a country was in such a disordered state as this now was. We now witnessed something which had never been heard of before. Men were let loose on the country of a most infamous description—men who lived by the existence of disorder, and whose interest it was to create disorder if they found none. With all the respect which he had for the noble lord at the head of the Home Department, he could never think of the circumstance of Oliver having been let loose on the country in the manner he was but with abhorrence. In his progress from Birmingham to Wolverhampton, for he himself knew that he was there, and to Nottinghamshire and Lancashire, he had been guilty of stimulating unfortunate wretches to acts for which their lives were forfeited. Whenever Oliver withdrew from the scene, a complete change took place. Had his Majesty's Government, in 1812, stimulated the people in the disturbed counties in the manner in which Oliver and men of that description had lately stimulated the people—had they sent delegates among them to inflame them, as men's minds were more disturbed than now, the results would have been very different. He would caution Government during the recess not to play the same game over again—not to stimulate the people to acts of violence, that these acts might serve as a justification to further encroachments on the liberties of the country. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh thought, after what had passed, he might claim the indulgence of the House for a short time. He called on the hon. gentleman to state, whether it was not from Mr. Finnerty he had received the papers to which he had called the attention of the House? When he felt himself bound in vindication of his character to institute proceedings against Mr. Finnerty, he did not resort to a Government prosecution, but went before the grand jury himself, and they found the bill. With regard to the facts stated in these affidavits, it had been said that he smiled at their recital. He did indeed smile at their imputation; for though he felt it to be one most abhorrent to his nature, it was also one so remote from truth, that he could treat it only with contempt. The origin of the whole was this:—Mr. Finnerty had supposed that he had been the means of preventing him from going out with the Walcheren expedition. In consequence of that supposition, Mr. Finnerty wrote a libel, imputing to him a legal murder, by unduly procuring the conviction of a man named Orr. The libel was of a nature which he thought he could not pass over, and he therefore proceeded in the way he had stated. During the progress of the action, an officer of rank in his Majesty's service had called upon him from Mr. Finnerty, and stated that Mr. Finnerty was willing to make such acknowledgement of his error as would be satisfactory. He however thought it his duty to reject this application, and declared that the law should take its course. After this he heard nothing more on that subject from Mr. Finnerty. He learned, however, that very soon after, Mr. Finnerty went to Ireland, where he employed himself in collecting the affidavits which had just been read by the hon. gentleman, and which contained statements with respect to him altogether false and unfounded. In making this explanation it was not necessary for him to conceal who Mr. Finnerty was; the fact might not perhaps be known to some who heard him, but Mr. Finnerty had previously been a convicted libeller in Ireland, and had there suffered the punishment of the law along with two others for that offence. If, therefore, he had prevented such a person from going with the Walcheren expedition, he conceived he should have done nothing improper; but it was upon the erroneous supposition of his having done so, that Mr. Finnerty wrote the libel which he thought it was his duty to prosecute; and, because he would enter into no compromise with the libeller, the affidavits which the House had heard had been procured for the purpose of being read in court. When Mr. Finnerty was brought up for judgment, he proceeded to read the affidavits, and having read two of them, was stopped. One of the two which were read, stated that the (Lord Castlereagh) had transported an innocent man to Botany-bay. Now, let the House consider, in what situation a public man was placed, if he was liable to have affidavits thus brought forward against him, affidavits filled with false assertions, and got up perhaps by perjury. He might have remained still ignorant of the unfounded charges thus brought against him, had he not received two letters from Ireland on the subject of the accusation, respecting the sending a man to Botany-bay. One letter was from Lord Bantry, and the other from Captain Sutherland, in quite the opposite side of the island. These officers expressed their surprise that he should be charged with sending the individual in question to Botany-bay, as they had themselves sat on the Court-martial by which he was tried, convicted, and sentenced. Another of the affidavits which had been read, charged him with being present at one of those punishments, on the atrocity of which the hon. gentleman had said so much. If there had been any punishment of the kind which the hon. gentleman had described, he would agree with him in calling it torture, but there had been none such in Ireland. He abhorred torture for the purpose of extorting truth as much as the hon. gentleman did, but such a practice had never prevailed in Ireland. The punishments had been punishments for offences committed, and had been the means of saving the country from much bloodshed; but while he vindicated the Irish government against the charge of inflicting torture, he must at the same time say, that he had not been present at any of the punishments in question. He had never in the course of his life seen any man flogged, except a soldier in his own militia regiment.

Mr. H. Addington said, the hon. gentleman opposite had erroneously supposed that Lord Sidmouth had formerly known the character of Castle. He had been assured by his noble relation that he never knew that person until the month of January last, which was precisely the time referred to by the hon. and learned gentleman (the Attorney-General) as the period when communications took place between Castle and his Majesty's Government. With regard to the extract from a pamphlet which the hon. baronet had read, though without mentioning its title, he could assure him that it contained a mis-statement. There might once have been a Mr. Nicholls at the office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, but there was no such person employed there now. But he had risen principally with a view of doing justice to a much injured individual—he meant Mr. Oliver. (Hear, hear.) Within this fortnight, two magistrates of the county of York, who had received an unfavourable impression as to the conduct of Mr. Oliver in the country, had requested that he might undergo an examination at the office for the Home Department. One of these magistrates came from Yorkshire on purpose, and the other was a much-respected member of that House, whose absence he regretted, as that gentleman would have corroborated the statement he had to make. These magistrates took the examination: the individual who brought the charge was confronted with Mr. Oliver, and the result was, that both magistrates declared themselves completely satisfied that the charge was false; that there was not indeed the smallest foundation for supposing that he had provoked the insurrection in the country; and that there had been nothing blameable either in the language or conduct of the person thus accused. It was his duty to make this statement, because the facts could only be made known to the House through him. Mr. Oliver had taken no part in any plots. He came to the Home-office in the beginning of April, and offered information which he considered beneficial to the country, but which he had not obtained by being implicated in any conspiracy. He asked no reward, and never received a shilling from Government, except what served to defray his travelling expenses. Information had been transmitted to the Home-office, that the insurrection which had been attempted was to break out on the 9th or 10th of June. All the magistrates in the disturbed districts, who had written on the subject, agreed in fixing upon the same date. The duty required of Mr. Oliver was to go to the country to ascertain whether this report was correct, and to transmit to the Home-office what information he might collect. This, it was supposed, would save time to the magistrates; and the information, it was thought, would be more speedily collected than by relying solely on the separate communications of the magistrates. He carried letters of recommendation to five or six magistrates, and was ordered to return by the 5th of June, as by that time it was necessary that the executive government should be prepared with precautions against the imminent danger which threatened the peace of the country. Mr. Oliver, however, stayed by accident a day or two beyond the limited time; and he had himself written a letter to hasten his return. When Mr. Oliver came to the office and offered to give evidence, he declared he did so in the hope of saving the country; and he was fully persuaded of his sincerity.

Mr. Barham doubted much whether the country, or even that House, would concur in the judgment of acquittal which the secret tribunal to which the right hon. gentleman referred had pronounced on the spy Oliver. Those who had not the advantage of having been present at the examination, must decide on the facts already within their knowledge. For his part, he should declare, that his judgment could not be on the favourable side, when he recollected what he had heard from a departed right hon. friend of his, whose memory had been so justly eulogised that night. Mr. Ponsonby had told him, that he believed, in his conscience, that the insurrection would not have taken place had it not been for Oliver. He had been so struck with this observation, that he asked

Lord Cochrane declared, that since the commencement of the session Parliament had been employed, not in redressing the grievances of the people, but in repressing the expression of their sentiments. None of the allegations of the petitions on the table had been inquired into; but when green bags were introduced by the noble lord opposite, they were, without delay, referred to committees, and reports made to the House, without any opportunity being afforded to shew the falsity of the allegations in the evidence.

Mr. W. Smith could not help expressing his satisfaction at hearing the condemnation of torture to extract evidence which had been pronounced by the noble lord (Castlereagh). With respect to Sir Thomas Judkin Fitzgerald, who had been alluded to, he knew not whether he was dead or alive, but he held in his hand a pamphlet which purported to be a report of his trial. This report contained the defence of Fitzgerald by himself, in which he professed sentiments most opposite to those which the noble lord had expressed; for he declared to a jury, that on a variety of occasions he had ordered to be flogged persons who afterwards proved to be innocent, in a most unmerciful manner, for the purpose of extracting truth. If this was not true, why had it not been contradicted? Why had the pamphlet in question never been prosecuted? Was it not true that the man who had stated in a court of justice that he had made use of torture in a number of instances, for the sake of obtaining truth—who exulted and gloried in having done this, had afterwards been made a baronet. (Hear, hear, hear.) If this was true, how could the government disconnect themselves from him?—Would not the fair inference in such a case be, that government not only wished the infliction of this torture, but that they had rewarded this individual for doing that which they were ashamed to do themselves, but which must always remain a terrible stain in the administration of the Irish government? (Hear, hear, hear.) He had heard such things mentioned as having taken place, on the most respectable authority, authority which he could no more doubt, than he could doubt the horrible nature of them. They ought to be held up as a beacon to all future times. They could not be forgotten any more than the rebellion could be forgotten—and they would be perpetually brought forward till Government took shame to themselves—(hear, hear)—until they made an apology to the country for having permitted or connived at these abominable practices. He was at all events glad to hear them disclaimed by the noble lord; and they ought to be held out to all future governments, as a lesson that these things might never take place again. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning said, he was unwilling to prolong the debate; but after that night's revival of charges, time after time brought forward; and as often denied and disclaimed—charges calculated to make an unfair impression, because now introduced with a pretence of candour—he could not consent that the question should go to that division which would consign it to the contempt of the House and of the country, without making a few observations. Every man who was at all acquainted with the hon. member who spoke last, must be surprised at his assertion of ignorance, whether the defendant in the cause to which he had referred were alive or dead; since his usual habit was to select objects of attack from the absent or the deceased. (Hear, hear.) Fortunately for that hon. member, the individual whom he had last accused was no more, and a reply from him was impossible; but however convenient this species of hostility might be, it would at least be fair: and more generous in future to confine his animadversions to the living, if not to the present. He had entirely mistaken the plea put in by the noble lord (Castlereagh); who, far from objecting to inquiry, had assiduously courted it; but he required, and had a right to require, that it should be distinctly brought forward; that he should be fairly, and with due notice, put upon his trial; and that his conduct in Ireland should not be mixed up with matters wholly irrelevant—with discussions upon foreign politics and cotton twist. (Hear, and laughter.) The great complaint of the noble lord was, that accusations which, if true, would not only render him unfit for his high station, but call for the vindictive animadversion of Parliament, were not produced after regular notice, or in the middle of an active session, when debate and refutation were possible (to say nothing of the period of 20 years which had elapsed since the transactions), but were accidentally thrust forward for the very purpose that they might not be answered and disproved. And from what sources did they emanate? Had the hon. gentleman ventured to reply to the demand, from whence he procured his affidavits—whether from a pardoned traitor, or a pilloried libeller? Those sources might be perfectly pure; but conforming to the received opinions of mankind, it might have been as well to state that they were such as to ordinary minds appeared suspicious, though to the mind of the hon. member they might be peculiarly acceptable—to him, whatever calumnies he could promulgate on the authority of a traitor who had been pardoned, or a libeller who had had the advantage of standing in the pillory, were no doubt peculiarly gratifying. (Hear.) He ought, however, to have disclosed the channel through which he had procured them, in compassion to the poor, weak, miserable understandings of those who, not up to the times, still thought, as of old, that sources less exceptionable might have been discovered. Was this a period, he would ask, to go back to the history of Ireland—to rake up the dissensions that had once unhappily there prevailed? No doubt atrocities might be found, precedents of public treason and private violence might be dragged forward, to equal, if not to exceed the crimes of the present day; but every man who had the happiness and tranquillity of his country at heart would rather wish, that transactions so long past, and so deeply lamented, should be buried in oblivion, or at least only be introduced with the solemnity of a judicial inquiry. What was the situation of his noble friend compared with that of his unnamed accusers? Men who had shared in repeated pardons, and hid their degraded heads under a general amnesty, now advanced to revile the individual to whom they owed their despicable lives: a pardoned traitor, a forgotten incendiary, a wretch who escaped the gallows, and screened himself in humble safety only by the clemency of his noble friend, was now to be produced as the chief witness for his conviction. If the legislature had consented to bury in darkness the crimes of rebellion, was it too much to expect that rebels, after 20 years, should forgive the crime of having been forgiven? (Continued cheers.) Personal delicacy had restrained the noble lord, more particularly with respect to one individual, from stating his instrumentality, on the change of the Government from Lord Camden to Lord Cornwallis, in screening a libeller from the remnant of his merited punishment, and that to-night the House had witnessed the reward of his exertions. The occasion was not less remarkable. Would any man but the hon. member have supposed, that the motion of which notice had been given could be converted into a vehicle for personal slander—accusations not merely against the Government, but against an individual who, had he not fortunately been able, from recollection, to repel them, would have been consigned to the misconstruction of five months, to the obloquy of a whole recess, during which he might have been exposed to the hatred, contempt, and abhorrence of his countrymen? who, had preparation been necessary, could have been prepared with an answer to these calumnies, revived by the last speaker with such aggravated acrimony? All things seemed to concur in condemning such a discussion—if no considerations of justice to the noble lord could weigh with the other side, was the conduct of Government of so little importance as to be debated collaterally, or were the matters so obvious as to require no previous notice? He admitted that a retrospect of the affairs of Ireland afforded a warning lesson, but not such as the hon. member had endeavoured to inculcate. Did it not shew how wearily the slightest indication of an approach to that state when man should be armed against man in civil contest, ought to be watched, and how promptly Government ought

ment to Parliament to adopt measures more adequate to the suffocation of rebellion in its infancy. The address that night proposed was principally occupied with the great preparations of the session to check incipient rebellion; but it was not a little singular, and probably not a little disappointing to the noble lord and the hon. baronet opposite, (Lord Cochrane and Sir F. Burdett) that one most important topic was omitted. Surely they must of all men deeply deplore that no allusion was made to the numerous petitions they had the honour, if an honour it were, of presenting to Parliament in favour of reform. If the Address were to be recorded as a counterpart to the speech from the throne about to be delivered, at least it ought to be an impartial record: it was a proceeding quite new, and care ought to be taken, if it were allowed, that the precedent was a fair one, for never would unhappy deluded historians be more misled than he who should take the hon. gentleman's voluminous, ill-asserted, ill-composed, and worse written epitome of the important business of the session, as a true representation of what had been done by the House. All mention of the countless petitions for reform seemed carefully shunned. If he (Mr. C.) were called upon to say with what the Session opened, and with what the House was occupied, week after week, day after day, and all day long, without respite or intermission, he should answer—petitions for reform in Parliament; hundreds at a time had been poured through the doorway, and of all of them it might be truly said,

Exactly alike they most assuredly were not, but there was such a resemblance, as well became sentient puppets in the country, put in motion by the skilful master of the show in town; pulsations in the extremities, answering with the utmost regularity (by the intervention of the mail coaches), to the beatings of the old heart in the centre. (Hear, hear.) Yet all these seem to have been forgotten by the hon. member, when he took his Pisgah sight of the session and its business, gazing at his land of promise; and God forbid that, as he viewed it, it should be a land of performance. Standing on his more lofty eminence, he had overlooked the mountain of petitions which he and his friends had procured and presented, and he had offered nothing as a consolation to the grief and bitter disappointment of the noble lord and the hon. baronet. Would the House consent to adopt an address so defective; a portrait in which the nose was left out? (Hear, hear, hear.) The most important feature of the session was forgotten: an oblivion was thrown over the petitions, as if the framer of the address had been ashamed of their presence. How otherwise could this melancholy deficiency be accounted for? It was a mystery which even the sagacity of the hon. chief magistrate of the city of London could not solve; (Laughter.) If he recollected rightly, Pope had these two lines:

and they would well apply to the address upon the table: it was, indeed, a patched and piebald composition, such as had seldom before been seen. Judging from the erasures, the alterations, the blots and the blurs, it seemed to have been the work, not merely of many heads, but hands; and it formed a singular illustration of the hon. mover's notions of political economy, that the division of labour is the true principle of multiplied employment. Having the old major at his elbow, it was singular that he should have divided the labour so unequally and unfairly, assigning to his ancient friend the manufacture of 500, or perhaps 500,000 petitions for parliamentary reform, while he himself, and all the rest of his able coadjutors, had employed themselves upon an address, which at last was but a miserable specimen of composition and penmanship. In framing an address against Ministers, the principal object was to agree upon some point of crimination: but it was an old observation made by one of the former leaders against Ministers, that opposition should never venture to go from negative to affirmative. It would have been well if this rule had been observed with regard to the address before the House; the numerous penners of it should not have launched into affirmations, because they implied the existence of ideas. When they came to the subject of parliamentary reform, it was necessary for them to turn a sentence, so that all should be satisfied, and various and discordant must have been the opinions hazarded. First, the hon. baronet, who went straight forwards for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage—in short, just such as they existed in the time of Hugo the Great, conqueror of the Picts, who, while he built his wall with one hand, dealt out Universal Suffrage with the other—a true reformer of the good old school. (Hear, and laughter.) The hon. baronet, however, was well read in history, and coming down to more modern times, he found that there were some anti-Hugonians, and Universal Suffrage became a matter of doubt, and he hesitated in deciding, whether the much calumniated curfew was or was not the signal for a general election. Then came it to the turn of the more moderate reformers, to give their opinion upon the sentence: they held Annual Parliaments, annual disturbances, and Universal Suffrage, general disorganization; and after them followed the hon. mover himself, to whom might be applied what was said of a conqueror of old—“That he never led any nation to battle, whom he had not previously reduced to humiliation in the field.” The hon. mover's ranks were therefore filled, as the House now plainly saw, by those whose doctrines he had often scouted with more contempt and ridicule; than it would be prudent for any other man to employ. The three classes of reformers, those who went to extremes, those who did not favour doctrines quite so extravagant, and those who thought that voting ought to be commensurate with taxation, were all obliged to give way to his authority; he refused to admit the sentence which each party had blotted to his fancy, and that subject which had been the daily food of the session, was entirely omitted. If, therefore, he (Mr. C.) had no other objection to the address, it would be sufficient for him to find that it excluded what he considered the proudest and most magnanimous proceeding of the House, namely, that whatever dangers might impend, whatever menaces might be employed, the House had stood firmly by the Constitution, and had rejected petitions, which had for object its destruction. (Hear.) Notwithstanding many discouragements, he entertained a sanguine hope, that the country had now seen the worst, and that improvements, partly moral and partly physical, had already commenced. While he admitted that some part of the distresses of the country might originate in accidental causes, he could not shut his eyes to the conviction, to which they had been long open; that the greater part of our calamities had arisen from circumstances over which man had no control; and though the designing had employed these difficulties, not to produce disaffection, (for that he never would allow,) but to excite despondency, yet that feeling was gradually subsiding; a bad harvest in one year had multiplied our difficulties; but the fair promise of the present warranted a sanguine hope that many of those difficulties would be removed. In this respect, therefore, the address was defective, and he could not vote in its favour, unless the happy prospect before us were at least mentioned. It had not been always easy to discriminate between the cries of distress, the genuine voice of the people, and the clamours of rebellion; but the principal demands had been, retrenchment in the expenditure, abolition of sinecures, and the new modelling of the Poor Laws. A fourth topic, to which, by artifices, undue importance had been given, was Parliamentary Reform; and as it was not stated as a grievance in the address, as it was not hinted at from beginning to end, it was but fair to conclude, that in the hon. mover's opinion, the House had given that question all due consideration. The progress that had been made on the great subject of the Poor Laws, on which representations had been sent from all parts of the country, was most satisfactory, and yet it had received no due attention in the proposed address. As to retrenchments in the various departments of the State, however low and close they might be pared, still some would be found to contend that it would have been right to have cut nearer; but he appealed to the House whether, even before the inquiries of the Committee, Ministers had not shewn every disposition to diminish the expenditure; and after the great question had been entered into in its details, they had evinced their perfect readiness to comply with whatever could reasonably be demanded. With regard to sinecures, had nothing been done to satisfy the claims of the people; and yet where was any mention made of them in the proposed address to the throne? If it were to be adopted, what would the future historian say, after vainly turning over statutes and indexes, when he should find, that in the year 1817, a sagacious seer had lived, who, in his retrospect at the end of the session, had omitted even to state that sinecures had been abolished? When he (Mr. C.) in former years, 1810 and 1811, voted in favour of the bill of an hon. member, (Mr. Bankes,) he thought that in the cry of the people there was more of clamour than of substance, but he had yielded to it, because he held it expedient to get rid of this blot upon the political establishment; but it never would have received his support, had not some power been given to the Crown of remunerating faithful services. He well remembered with what acclamations of thankfulness his vote was then received. The bill was considered the most important measure that ever passed the House; it was the theme of declamation in every moving rostrum; it was proclaimed with trumpet sound; and old women went mad with imagining that if sinecures were once abolished, the sky would rain manna upon them. How striking was the contrast now: sinecures were abolished, even upon better terms than in the bill of 1813, yet the abolition was considered a matter of trifling importance; it was nothing—the giant dwindled into a pygmy, like some of the marvellous fables of that work which, so infantine still was his mind, he considered second only to the classics—"the Arabian Nights' Entertainments." The rise of the funds had been urged as an ill omen. He contended it was the reverse. The hon. baronet had referred to an ancient poet for the signs of the times; he would quote a poet of our own time—

This was the case in January. What was it in July, and what was the cause of the contrast? He was ready to declare in the face of his constituents, that it was those measures which were essential to our security, and contributed to the salvation of the Constitution.

Mr. Brougham rose to reply. He began by stating, that had it not been for the right hon. gentleman's speech, he should not have availed himself at that late hour of the claim to a reply, which the usual courtesy of the House gave him; but have left the arguments urged by the noble lord in his defence, without much anxiety for the result, to the decision of those who had honoured him by attending to his statements. Now, however, he felt it due to those who supported the address, to himself, and to the question, to rescue it from the misapprehensions of the right hon. gentleman, who, of course, could not be supposed capable of misrepresentation; and he really must say, that had he no other reason for again offering himself to the attention of the House, he should feel called to do so, in order to express his gratitude for the amusement he had received from the very lively and witty speech they had just heard. The hon. and gallant general (General Phipps) by his cheering seemed to think it quite impossible that any one should be entertained or pleased by what was delivered against his own side of the question. He could assure him, that if he had heard as many speeches delivered against himself here and elsewhere, often heavy and dull enough, as some members had, he would feel that it was very possible to be diverted, at so late an hour and in so exhausted a condition, with any thing so ingenious, witty, and humorous, as the speech they had just heard, without much considering what quarter it came from, or against whom it was pointed. The right hon. gentleman had charged the address principally with omissions, and above all with leaving out the subject of Parliamentary Reform. Now, for his part, he could hardly regret this, as it had afforded the right hon. gentleman an occasion for letting off his long meditated speech on that question, which for some odd reason or other he had not chosen to deliver in the debate on the worthy baronet's motion upon the subject,—and he must say the right hon. gentleman himself was rather ungrateful in making such invectives against an omission which he had turned to so much account; to be sure, had it been otherwise, he did not at all know that he would not have contrived to bring in the speech which he had ready for use. That was his way of debating. He had honoured him (Mr. B.) by comparing him to a commander, and had given a very distorted account of his operations; and, it was said, that chiefs accustomed to be opposed, got to know one another's tactics very precisely. Now, he could not have the presumption to say it of himself, but the little legion—the band on that side, who were generally opposed to the right hon. gentleman, as one leader is to another, had learnt pretty accurately his course of tactics. It was this—he took care to have magazines well stored with ready-made, cut and dry speeches, prepared for future occasions, and adapted as replies to the topics he supposed might be used. Indeed, he had not left them to guess this, for he had once let his secret out in plain terms. He had said, that in most debates, one could, by thinking on the subject beforehand, anticipate the arguments that would be used on the opposite side; accordingly this was the hon. gentleman's method. He deemed it more convenient, better suited to the importance of the subjects, and becoming the dignity of the place, to weigh well what his adversaries were to say, and be ready with an elaborate—answer might not be always the fit word—but harangue or merriment, perhaps, than trust to the moment. It was impossible to deny that this plan had great advantages; but it had, he was afraid, its inconveniences also. While the expected topics were used, for which the replies were ready got up, all went well. But if, as would now and then crossly happen, they never were used at all, then came in the difficulty how to get in all the fine things prepared with so much labour to meet them. That all this work should be thrown away—all the hours of day and midnight oil consumed in vain was too hard, and in common humanity could not be expected—so that the passages got up must at all events be introduced, and if the expected topics did not come on the other side, they must be supposed to have come. Accordingly this was exactly the right hon. gentleman's way—he fancied his adversary had used the arguments he himself was prepared to meet—he put them in his mouth, and answered them; or he supposed something to be left out which was not, and he amused himself and the House with being very droll upon the omission. Both these ways of discussing the question he had resorted to on the present occasion. It happened that the refusal of the petitions of the people by the Parliament was stated distinctly, though generally, in the address. He should like to know, what would have been said had it specially complained of an act of the House of Commons in particular? Would not the right hon. gentleman have been the first to ridicule so strange a solecism as the House going up with an address to the throne complaining of what it had done itself? Because this absurdity was avoided in the only practicable way of stating the point, the right hon. gentleman had come out with all his collection of matter, extremely droll and laughable no doubt—well adapted to the lateness of the hour, whether it might be suitable or not to the gravity of the subject, and more conducive to merriment, certainly, than to instruction: he had entertained them with Hugo the Pict—and the wall—and the Saxons—and mail coaches—and Cataline (who, oddly enough, proved to be what he called the old Major)—and old women gaping for mamma—and scenes, and trumpets, and moveable rostrums—a very strange allusion from such a quarter, for the right hon. gentleman must really be the most ungrateful of men so to treat those convenient vehicles of itinerant oratory, to which he was more indebted than any individual in the country, Cataline himself not excepted. —The right hon. gentleman next complained, that the labours of the finance committee and the sinecure bills, were not mentioned in the address. The reason was plain—when coupled with the system of compensation, the abolition of sinecures was a measure of very different complexion from their simple abolition. Many persons thought this measure, as it now stood, worse than the old system. The most prevalent opinion was, that it did as much harm as good—while only a select few, with the member for Corfe Castle (Mr. Banks) at their head, deemed the change an improvement, and even they did not think it a very great one. Those, however, who with him (Mr. B.), and he believed with the majority, he was sure with the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), held it to be a matter of almost entire indifference, could not be expected to testify much gratitude for it; and as it appeared to them neither one thing nor another, it seemed better to say nothing at all about it. The right hon. gentleman, who viewed it precisely in this light, somewhat strangely complained because it was not highly praised or pointedly censured. The noble lord had entered on a great variety of topics, conducive, as he supposed, to his own vindication. He was confident that the House, by attending to his (Mr. B.'s) opening speech, would find almost all those topics answered by anticipation. But, however unwilling to detain them at that late hour, there were one or two charges launched at him by the noble lord, which he felt it necessary to repel. He had been accused of harbouring dangerous designs—of befriending reforms of a violent complexion—nay, of supporting, or at least countenancing, opinions of a revolutionary tendency. He could not help thinking this charge somewhat hard on the present occasion; and he felt that there was no pleasing any two of the Ministers he stood opposed to. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had made it the burthen of his whole speech, or song (he hardly knew which to call it), that he said nothing at all of reform. The noble lord inveighed at him still more loudly, or at least as loudly (for to be more loud was impossible), as one whose speech countenanced the wildest of the reformers. So, again, when he had carefully explained, even at the risk of fatiguing the House by going out of his way, the absurdity of the delusions prevailing among hundreds of thousands in the country, respecting the exportation of yarns, with the express intention of allaying the ferment he perceived to be arising out of those mistakes, all the thanks he got for his pains from the right hon. gentleman was a broad sneer, that he had made a speech about foreign politics and cotton twist. Really he fared as ill between the two colleagues, as if he were one of the Cabinet. He could hardly have been more roughly handled by those ministerial oracles, if he had been any of their own fellow ministers. They had fallen upon him and plucked him almost as much as they were wont to do some third man among them, or as the one of these two used to belabour the other. Nevertheless he should persist in doing his duty, and, in spite of the right hon. gentleman's merriment, he should still hold the subject even of cotton twist, as an extremely grave one. He heartily wished they might not all find, before a few months passed over their heads, that it was any thing rather than matter of ridicule.

To be sure, were he at that hour to go again into it, the hon. gentleman would be convinced it was neither light nor amusing; but he was anxious once more to avow his opinion, that the desire so generally entertained in the manufacturing districts, to prevent the exportation, was a delusion—was, what the right hon. gentleman would, after his manner, term a mere twist. He was anxious to state this, because he had been applied to by the unfortunate and highly meritorious persons who laboured under this mistake, and for whose great distresses he felt deeply; and because, whatever little weight his authority might derive from their confidence, he felt it his duty to throw into the opposite scale. This he did, in order to prevent the rising ferment, at the risk of forfeiting, at the certain cost of weakening their favour, and injuring that darling popularity he was accused of seeking. And for this he was rewarded by the noble lord with the epithet of revolutionary—by the right hon. gentleman with broad laughter at his foreign politics and cotton twist. Such things did not discourage him: on the contrary, he would now add, with similar views of anxiety for the internal peace of the country, what he had before accidentally omitted, that he conceived the recent proceedings, both of the master hosiers and workmen in Leicestershire, were, in his opinion, extremely unwise. (Here Mr. B. entered into some further details relative to this subject.) Reverting to the noble lord's charge of violent innovation, he must say that he felt no sort of resentment at it—he ascribed it to the manifest agitation, or perhaps he ought to call it animation of feelings under which the noble lord had delivered his speech, and which had naturally led him somewhat beyond what he might have seriously intended to state. But in justice to himself, he must appeal to the House, whether either that night, or on any one other occasion, he had ever brought forward a single measure, or uttered a word, that betrayed a leaning towards plans of a sweeping, rash, or violent reform. On the contrary, it was his conscientious opinion, and by that he shaped, and while he lived should ever shape his course—that in effecting improvements in our political institutions, we ought to proceed warily and even slowly—with gradual steps and a cautious hand, seeing how much easier it always was to pull down and destroy, than to build up and to restore. These were his principles—to these he had steadily adhered, and he defied any man to shew him one exception. To be sure, he belonged not to the class of reformers in which these Ministers were to be found; he was not for sitting a passive and idle spectator of the ravages of time upon the Constitution, and expecting that time would repair what time alone had destroyed—in other words, doing nothing and trusting to blind chance. But a rash, hasty, wholesale system of change, was utterly abhorrent to his views. Then the noble lord, accused him of partiality towards the Bonaparte family, because he objected to the mean and pitiful conduct of the government in stooping to annoy a private individual of that house, who could do harm to nobody. The noble lord was as much mistaken here as in his allegation that he (Mr. B.) could not forgive those who put Bonaparté down.—He thought of these charges he had some right to complain—for it did so happen, that he had been the only member, certainly the very first, who seconded the bill for enabling government to keep Bonaparté in safe custody. He had always regarded the ambition and tyranny of that person as inconsistent with the liberties of Europe. He had uniformly recommended the most vigorous measures against his power. He had blamed the Government, not for opposing him, but for opposing him inefficiently—for dividing their attacks—for splitting their forces—for carrying on the war, as they waged it during many years, in a feeble manner, and upon narrow views, the failure of which was certain. These had ever been his sentiments, however feebly he might have supported them, but he had uniformly maintained them both in that House and out of doors. The noble lord and right hon. gentleman had both expressed great indignation at such a motion as the present being brought forward so late in the session. But was it any thing very new? Did not every year of war terminate regularly with a debate on the State of the Nation, as certainly as a vote of credit was proposed? Now to him it appeared, that the country was at present more in a state to render that discussion necessary, than at any period of the war. He rejoiced that he had brought forward the subject; all the anger which it had excited on the opposite side only confirmed him in this feeling; and he trusted that the same question would always be brought forward as regularly as the session closed in each succeeding year. If abler persons refrained from doing so, his feeble services should always be at the command of the country in this way. The noble lord was equally annoyed at what he termed being taken by surprise upon the Irish questions. Had he (Mr. B.) not given notice of an Address upon the State of public affairs? Then were Ireland and Irish affairs no part of public affairs? How could a State of the Nation be mentioned without giving the noble lord this notice? But his right hon. supporter inveighed against the use of the affidavits read by his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet), and demanded with the air of one going to dispose at once of those documents, whether he had not received them from Mr. Finnerty, who had been prosecuted by the noble lord? But what could it signify whose hands gave in the affidavits? The question was, who signed and swore them? Now they were the testimony of eye-witnesses and of sufferers—of persons who had seen, and persons who had undergone the torture. But the noble lord called them extra-judicial. They were no such thing: they were sworn before Judges in Ireland, and when tendered in the Court of King's Bench here, were not at all objected to, for any irregularity in the Jurats, but only because a new and very doubtful rule excluded matter of justification in a question of mitigation of punishment. Much had been said of the appointments of Messrs. Reynolds and Manners. Of the former he willingly left the merits upon the very facts urged by the noble lord. Of the latter, he must repeat that his objections remained undiminished; and he had felt it his duty to the public to state them openly. It was admitted that Mr. Manners had been for some years the editor of a most infamous publication. He (Mr. B.) was the last man to censure, as unworthy of promotion, those who were guilty of excess in political discussion. Political libels might be blameable, but they belonged to a very different class from private slander. He said nothing against the principles espoused by the work in question, nor even against the discussions of a political nature which it might contain. But he had happened to see two numbers of it some years ago (and friends whose accuracy he could trust, who had seen more of it, assured him all was of a piece), and he ventured to say, that those publications abounded in private defamation of the most base, scandalous, and disgusting nature. He needed only to mention the details of what passed in the recesses of a noble family's bed-chamber, that family being of an opposite side in politics to the party favoured by the work. He still thought that the appointment of a man who had been imprisoned as the editor of such a publication, for another private libel contained in it, did very little credit to the government. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. H. Addington) had mistaken the drift of the attacks made upon the Home Department, upon himself and his noble relative. He set all down to the score of their great vigour and efficiency in the public service. "Good luck," said he, "see what it is to be an able and successful Minister in difficult times—you are run down by the disaffected." Now, this was not quite the ground of complaint, but when the due exercise of the new laws depended on the intellect of that kindred pair, it was natural to exclaim, O miseram hominum conditionem, where each individual holds his liberty upon so frail a tenure as the eminent sagacity of the right hon. gentleman, and the no less eminent sagacity of his noble relation, in discerning the tricks of their own Oliver.

Sir F. Burdett stated, that he was authorized to deny, that Mr. Finnerty had either directly or indirectly offered to enter into any compromise with the noble lord, in order to prevent his being brought up for judgment in 1810.

The Address was then negatived without a division.

HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition of Thomas John Evans the younger, now confined in Horsemonger-lane prison. The petitioner entered into a full justification of himself, and complained of having been ill-treated with respect to accommodations, as well in the Cold Bath-fields prison as in that of Horse-monger-lane.

Mr. H. Addington did not object to the petition being received, but he wished to state, that from undoubted authority he knew many of the allegations contained in the petition to be false, and the rest were gross exaggerations. He wished to know by whom the present petition had been put into the hon. member's hands, and whether he had any good reason for supposing that it was actually signed by the petitioner. His reason for asking the first question was, that he understood a Mr. Harmer had obtained the petition irregularly; and he put the second interrogation, because he had been informed by authority, the accuracy of which could not be disputed, that the petition which had previously been presented from the elder Evans had not been signed by him.

Mr. Bennet replied, that he received the present petition that evening from, he believed, a clerk of Mr. Harmer; and that, with respect to the signature, he could give no information.

Mr. Boswell thought himself called upon by the allusion which had been made to him, to say a few words. He had visited the elder Evans in prison, and had ascertained from his own mouth that neither of the two petitions which had been presented from him to Parliament were signed by himself. Mr. Evans being requested at the same time, wrote the following note: "T. Evans, by desire, informs, that Mr. Harmer drew his petitions from memorials by T. E. but that Mr. Harmer did not bring it him for inspection after he had engrossed it." (Hear.) Mr. Evans was also asked whether, in his rough copies of the petition, he had used the words "gloomy dungeon," and he replied that he had not, but had used the expression of "strong room" only.

Mr. Bennet said, that he held in his hand the rough draughts of the petitions presented from the elder Evans, and it appeared by them that the words "gloomy dungeon" were used by him; and farther, that, with the exception of a few grammatical corrections, the manuscript was, in totidem verbis, similar to the rough copy.

Lord Castlereagh commented on the irregularity of the act of the solicitor in signing the petitions for the petitioner.

The petition was then read, and laid upon the table.

[EXTENTS IN AID COMMITTEE.] This Committee presented their Report, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Saturday, July 12.

[MR. SPEAKER'S SPEECH TO THE PRINCE REGENT.] This day being appointed for closing the session, the Prince Regent came down to the House, at two o'clock, with the usual state,

Mr. Speaker's Speech to the Prince Regent. [1880 and took his seat upon the throne. Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, was sent to command the attendance of the House of Commons.

Shortly afterwards Mr. Speaker, accompanied by a great number of members, came to the bar. Mr. Speaker then delivered the following Speech:—

"May it please your Royal Highness,

"In obedience to your Royal Highness's commands, we, his Majesty's faithful Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, attend your Royal Highness with our last bill of Supply at the close of a laborious session.

"Among the numerous subjects of deep public importance to which our consideration has been called, there are none that have more anxiously occupied our attention than those which relate to the Finances and internal State of the Country.

"In conformity with your Royal Highness's recommendation at the commencement of the session, we took such steps as seemed best calculated to ensure a full and serious investigation into the public income and expenditure. That investigation has been continued throughout the Session. From that investigation much has been done, much unquestionably remains to be done; but we trust we are justified in the conviction, that measuring our expenditure by what the real interests of the Empire may require, no apprehension need be entertained as to the stability of our resources.

"Deeply sensible of what we owe to your Royal Highness for having directed the estimates to be laid before us at the commencement of the Session, with every reduction in the establishments that sound policy would allow, we have had the satisfaction to find that the supplies might be provided without the imposition of any additional burdens upon the people; and we have the proud gratification to think, that notwithstanding the gigantic and unparalleled exertions which this country has been called upon to make, and the difficulties and pressure which must necessarily be the consequence of such exertions, at no period of its history has the public credit stood more sound, steady, and unshaken than at present.

"In considering, Sir, the internal state of the country, it has been painful to us to contemplate the attempts which have been made to take advantage of the distresses of a portion of the people, to convert them to wicked and mischievous purposes. His Majesty's faithful Commons, whilst they have been anxiously engaged in such measures as might check the further progress of these attempts, have not been unmindful of such other measures as might afford relief to the pressure of that distress. With this view we have turned our attention to the encouragement of the Fisheries, to the means of providing employment for the poor, and most diligently (although the limits of the Session would not allow of the completion of a measure), most diligently to a full and minute inquiry into the state and effect of the Poor Laws, a question in which the wealth, the industry, and the morality of the nation are so deeply implicated.

"Whilst we have deemed it our first duty to deliberate with unremitted solicitude upon these subjects of paramount importance, to these alone our deliberations have not been confined.

"Feeling how intimately connected the best interests of the country are with every thing that is of interest or concern to our Ecclesiastical Establishment, we hope that much of advantage will be derived to the public, and much of convenience to the Clergy, from the revision and consolidation of the laws affecting spiritual persons.

"To Ireland also, our earnest attention has been directed, in providing for the more deliberate investigation of presentments to be made by the Grand Juries, a measure of the most general influence over the whole of that part of the United Kingdom—a measure which we confidently hope will prove as salutary in practice, as it is unquestionably sound in principle.

"These, Sir, are the leading matters which have engrossed the labours of his Majesty's faithful Commons; and if this Session has not been marked with that brilliancy and splendour which has characterized former Sessions, yet we have the conscious satisfaction to reflect, that having had great duties to perform, to the performance of those duties we have applied a most faithful and indefatigable attention.

"Sir, the bill which it is my duty humbly to present to your Royal Highness is intitled, 'An Act for applying certain monies therein mentioned for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, and for further appropriating the supplies granted in this Session of Parliament,' to which, with all humility, we pray his Majesty's Royal Assent."

The Speaker then delivered the Appropriation Bill to Mr. Cowper, the Clerk Assistant of the Parliaments, who was in waiting within the bar to receive it; and to this bill, together with the Irish Election Laws Bill, and the English Savings Banks Bill, the Royal Assent was given, which was notified in the usual form.

THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH.] The Prince Regent then read the following Speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I cannot close this Session of Parliament without renewing my expressions of deep regret at the continuance of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.

"The diligence with which you have applied yourselves to the consideration of the different objects which I recommended to your attention at the commencement of the Session, demands my warmest acknowledgments; and I have no doubt that the favourable change which is happily taking place in our internal situation, is to be mainly ascribed to the salutary measures which you have adopted for preserving the public tranquillity, and to your steady adherence to those principles by which the Constitution, resources, and credit of the country, have been hitherto preserved and maintained.

"Notwithstanding the arts and industry which have been too successfully exerted in some parts of the country to alienate the affections of his Majesty's subjects, and to stimulate them to acts of violence and insurrection, I have had the satisfaction of receiving the most decisive proofs of the loyalty and public spirit of the great body of the people; and the patience with which they have sustained the most severe temporary distress cannot be too highly commended.

"I am fully sensible of the confidence which you have manifested towards me by the extraordinary powers which you have placed in my hands; the necessity which has called for them is to me matter of deep regret; and you may rely on my making a temperate but effectual use of them, for the protection and security of his Majesty's loyal subjects.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the supplies which you have granted to me; and for the laborious investigation, which, at my recommendation, you have made into the state of the income and expenditure of the country.

"It has given me sincere pleasure to find that you have been enabled to provide for every branch of the public service without any addition to the burthens of the people.

"The state of public credit affords a decisive proof of the wisdom and expediency, under all the present circumstances of those financial arrangements which you have adopted.

I have every reason to believe that the deficiency in the revenue is, in a great degree, to be ascribed to the unfavourable state of the last season, and I look forward with sanguine expectations to its gradual improvement.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The measures which were in progress at the commencement of the Session, for the issue of a new silver coinage, have been carried into execution in a manner which has given universal satisfaction; and to complete the system which has been sanctioned by Parliament, a gold coinage of a new denomination has been provided for the convenience of the public.

"I continue to receive from foreign powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country, and of their desire to preserve the general tranquillity.

"The prospect of an abundant harvest throughout a considerable part of the Continent is in the highest degree satisfactory. This happy dispensation of Providence cannot fail to mitigate, if not wholly to remove, that pressure under which so many of the nations of Europe have been suffering in the course of the last year; and I trust that we may look forward in consequence to an improvement in the commercial relations of this and of all other countries.

"I cannot allow you to separate without; commending to you, that upon your return to your several counties, you should use your utmost endeavours to defeat all attempts to corrupt and mislead the lower classes of the community, and that you should lose no opportunity of inculcating amongst them that spirit of concord and obedience to the laws, which is not less essential to their happiness as individuals, than it is indispensable to the general welfare and prosperity of the kingdom."

The Lord Chancellor then, by His Royal Highness's command, prorogued the Parliament to Monday, the 25th of August next.

Saturday, July 12.

The Speaker took the chair at two o'clock, and soon after the Usher of the Black Rod appeared and commanded the attendance of the House in the House of Peers, to hear the Speech from the Throne.

On their return, the Speaker took his seat at the table, and, as usual, read a copy of the Speech delivered by the Prince Regent (for which see the Lords).

The Members then separated.

APPENDIX.

AN ACCOUNT of the PUBLIC INCOME and EXPENDITURE of the United Kingdom for the Year ended the 5th of January, 1817; and of the probable INCOME and EXPENDITURE for the years ending the 5th of January 1818 and 1819, respectively; taken from the Fourth Report of the Select Committee on Finance.

IN stating the Public Income, your Committee propose to confine their view to the net produce received at the Exchequer; leaving out of their present consideration the previous payments out of the Gross Receipt, for Drawbacks, Bounties, and other Allowances and Expenses, as well as for the charge of collecting and managing the Revenue; the whole of which, although not immediately essential to the object of this Report, forms, however, a very important subject of attention and inquiry, inasmuch as it embraces an Expenditure out of the gross Revenue of Great Britain and Ireland, which in the year 1816 amounted to no less than 11,117,009/ *. Every diminution that can be made, by a careful revision of these payments, and by a vigilant and economical management, will be a substantial addition to the Income of the Country.

In order to exhibit a clear view of this extensive subject, and one which may be easily referable to the Accounts before the House, Your Committee have judged that the most eligible course would be to present it in two distinct Statements, both for Great Britain and for Ireland: the first shewing the whole of the Public Revenue and Resources actually received at each of the Exchequers within the year ended 5th January, 1817, together with the issues therefrom; whether such receipts and issues may have belonged to the service of that year, or have formed part of the ways and means and charges of the former or of preceding years: and the other, being intended to shew the Income and Expenditure (ordinary and extraordinary) properly appertaining to the year 1816 only.

In these statements your Committee will omit from their view of the Income of the year, in Great Britain, all sums received at the Exchequer, in consequence of any increase of Debt in the year 1816; and they will likewise exclude from this part of their account the remittances from Ireland for defraying the interest, &c. of the Loans for the service of that country, charged upon the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain, which will appear in their Statement of the Income and Expenditure of Ireland.

PUBLIC INCOME RECEIVED AT THE EXCHEQUER OF GREAT BRITAIN, IN 1816.

CONSOLIDATED FUND:

The Duties, Taxes, and other branches of Income, permanently forming a part of this Fund, paid into the Exchequer, amounted to	£. 37,399,350
In addition to which, there was carried to this Fund the sum of 1,310,202 l. out of the general produce of the War Taxes, to defray the interest, &c. of Loans charged thereon to the 5th of July, 1816; from which period certain War Duties of Customs were made permanent, and their specific produce appropriated for defraying the charges in question	£1,310,202
Also the Arrears of Property Tax to the 5th of January, 1817, not specially appropriated	374,006

ANNUAL DUTIES

Charged with the Payment of Exchequer Bills:

The amount of these Duties applied in the discharge of Exchequer Bills, within this period, was	2,931,343
These Annual Duties commence on the 25th of March in each year, and the surplus thereof, after defraying 3,000,000 l. of Exchequer Bills charged upon them, is carried to and forms a part of the Consolidated Fund. This surplus amounted, in the last year, to 2,206,056 l. *, and is always considerable; the duties granted for the discharge of these bills being more than adequate to that object.

WAR TAXES which terminated within the Year, and Duties of Excise continued to the 5th of July, 1821:

It appears that the total Amount of these Duties paid into the Exchequer in the last year, including 1,207,994 l. on account of the War Duty on Malt, which expired on the 5th of July, 1816, was	£17,030,032
From which being deducted the amount carried to the Consolidated Fund out of those Duties, as above stated	1,684,208

RECEIPTS not comprised under the foregoing Heads:

These Receipts, including the sum of 1,184,009 l. paid by Ireland on account of her proportion of the joint Expenditure for the year 1815, and also including the sum of 5,999,809 l. paid in on account of the Loan for that year, amounted to	7,915,451
Making a total Receipt of	£63,176,176

CONSOLIDATED FUND:

The total Amount of the Interest, Management, &c. of the Public Unredeemed Debt, was	£. 29,539,610
The Sinking Fund, and the Dividends payable to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of the Stock redeemed by them, including the sum of 1,612,220 l. the amount of the Sinking Fund of the debt of Ireland funded in Great Britain, was	12,987,636 proceed, and which forms the more immediate object of their investigation, they do not deem it necessary, in this place, to advert minutely to the result of this Account; more especially as your Committee conceive, that, from the extent and importance of the subject, it will be more satisfactory to the House that the state of the Public funded and unfunded Debt should be brought fully under its consideration in a separate Report, to which your Committee will consequently direct their attention as soon as possible. They therefore confine themselves to an observation arising out of a comparison of the total Sums issued and received, which, as it exhibits an access of 5,204,092*l.*‡ of Issues beyond the Receipts, would at first sight indicate an increase of Debt, whereby the difference must have been provided for; but this Sum being deducted from that proportion of the foregoing Issues which have been applied in the discharge of Debt, amounting in the whole to 14,602,238*l.*§, it will appear that there was a diminution of Debt on the 5th January 1817, as compared with the 5th January 1816, of 9,398,146*l.*;—the only circumstance which may in a degree affect the precise accuracy of this result, being the increase or diminution which may have taken place in the Balances at the Exchequer, at the beginning or close of the year.

Having thus detailed the Income and Expenditure of the year 1816, according to the actual Receipts into the Exchequer and the actual Issues thereout, your Committee now proceed to bring under the view of the House a Statement of the Public Income and Expenditure of Great Britain, as applying more particularly to the last year; in which Statement they will include, in addition to the permanent Revenue received within the year, only those Ways and Means granted by Parliament, which have been, or are

1°. CONSOLIDATED FUND:

The Income of this Fund in the year, ending 5th January, 1817, arising from the sources before stated, amounted to £ 39,083,558

2°. WAYS and MEANS granted by Parliament for the Supply of the Year:

Annual Duties upon Malt, Sugar, &c.	£ 3,000,000

And the Total Expenditure for the year 1816, on account of Great Britain	66,857,894

Your Committee think it necessary, in this place, to refer to the result which, as far as relates to the diminution of Debt, was adverted to in a former part of this Report: upon a comparison of the actual Receipts and Issues at the Exchequer of Great Britain, within the year 1816; whereas upon the first view of the present Statement of the Income and Expenditure properly belonging to the year, it appears, that after deducting from the excess of the Expenditure beyond the Income, the sum included in that Expenditure for the reduction of funded and unfunded Debt, there still remains the sum of 2,920,777*l.* †, being an increase of Debt upon the whole, incurred for the service of Great Britain in the year, ended 5th Jan. 1817.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.—PUBLIC INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.

This apparent disagreement between the two results will, however, be removed, when it is considered that the first of these statements comprehends the receipt and application of various large sums, principally arising from the collection within the year 1816, of the War Taxes, which had been granted as a part of the provision for former years, and which were applied in the course of that year, to satisfy anticipations which had been made on the credit of those Taxes, or in discharge of other outstanding demands. Your Committee think it proper, likewise, to point out to the attention of the House, that as the Income and Expenditure, which they have stated as belonging more properly to the last year, also comprises many charges, as well as some resources, which arose out of the transactions of a former period, and will therefore not recur, the Balance of the Income and Expenditure so exhibited, could not, with propriety, be assumed as the criterion of the probable balance of future years; even independently of the peculiar circumstances affecting the Revenue of 1816.

INCOME OF IRELAND FOR 1816.

The net amount received into the Exchequer, from the Customs, Excise, Stamp Duties, and every other branch of Revenue and Income, was	£. 4,561,353
There was also paid into the Exchequer of Ireland, or remaining to be remitted on account of the Loan contracted for in England, in the year 1815	2,622,640
Making a total Receipt of	7,183,993

EXPENDITURE:

The Charge upon the Consolidated Fund, in respect of the Public Funded Debt of Ireland, in Ireland and Great Britain, including 2,438,124 l. , payable to the Commissioners for the reduction of the said Debt, was	£.6,446,826
For the Civil List and other permanent Parliamentary Charges	539,138
Making the total of Permanent Charges	£. 6,985,964
The Expenditure on account of the Services of the last or of former years, actually paid within the above period, was	3,075,561
	10,061,525
And there was remitted to England, and paid into the Exchequer, towards making good the proportion of Ireland of $\frac{2}{17}$ of the joint Expenditure	1,184,009
Making the total Issues	11,245,534

In following the course which Your Committee have taken, in stating the Income and Expenditure of Great Britain, they now propose to submit to the House an Account of the Income of Ireland, as more particularly applicable to the year 1816; although the account, when presented in this shape, will differ but little from the account of the actual Receipts and Payments from the Excheque of Ireland within the year.

INCOME:

The total Revenue and Income of Ireland was, in the year ended the 6th of January 1817, as above stated	£. 4,561,353
---	-----------------

EXPENDITURE:

The total permanent Charge upon the Consolidated Fund of Ireland, for the year ended 5th of January 1817, was, as before stated	6,985,964
The total amount of the Supply granted, and of the Expenses incurred on the joint account of Great Britain and Ireland for the year 1816, was 26,342,423 l. , of which $\frac{2}{17}$, the proportion of Ireland, was	3,099,108
The Supply granted or Expense defrayed, on the separate account of Ireland, was	193,978
Making the total Supply	3,293,086
And the total Expenditure for the year 1816, on account of Ireland	10,279,050

The results of these Statements, are, that the total Revenue and Income of Ireland for the year 1816, amounted to 4,561,353*l.*;—that the charges of her Debt, and other payments of a permanent nature, amounted to 6,985,964*l.*; that the supply for that year to be defrayed by Ireland, as above stated, was 3,293,086*l.*; making a total Expenditure of 10,279,050*l.*, of which the sum of 2,438,124*l.* was issued to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt of Ireland.

vi PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.—PUBLIC INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.

The Exchequer of the two Countries having, from the 5th of January last, become united, and being now administered by one authority, Your Committee propose to take a view of the combined Receipt and Expenditure of the United Kingdom as more particularly applicable to the year ended 5th of January 1817, in order that the result of the actual Income and Expenditure of the two Countries thus united, may be before the House in one view, and may be compared with the Estimate of the probable future Income and Expenditure of the United Kingdom, in the years ending 5th of January 1818 and 5th of January 1819 respectively.

INCOME:

The total Income of Great Britain, applicable to the permanent Charges of that year, and to the Supplies granted for that period, was, as before stated	51,296,469
And of Ireland	4,561,353
Making a total Income of	55,857,822

EXPENDITURE:

The total Charge upon the Consolidated Fund in England was	£39,693,430
The Charge of the Debt of Ireland, and other payments of a permanent nature, was	6,985,984
Making the total permanent Charge of the United Kingdom	46,689,394
The total Supply of the two Countries, including the separate Charges of each, which have, from the 5th of January last, become joint charges, was	30,457,550
Making a total Expenditure	£77,146,944

Of which 15,078,772l. was on account of the reduction of Debt existing before the 5th of January 1816*.

ESTIMATED INCOME AND EXPENDITURE,

For the Years 1817 and 1818.

With a view to ascertain, so far as the subject admits, the measure of the deficiency produced in the receipts of the year 1816, your Committee called for an account from the principal departments of the Revenue, so framed as to exhibit the total produce in each of the last five years, of those duties only which have been in full collection throughout the whole of that period; whereby your Committee are enabled to present at one view a statement of the comparative productiveness of each branch of the Revenue, and of the whole together, in the year 1816, and for the four several years which preceded it.

The result of this comparison will shew, that the Revenue in the year 1816 was considerably less productive than in the year 1815; and that it was likewise deficient, though in a smaller degree, when compared with the average of the three years which preceded the year 1815. It will further be observed, that the receipt of the year 1815 was an extraordinary large one, and that the excess in that year in Great Britain so nearly counterbalances the deficiency in the year 1816, that the mean of those two years corresponds very closely with the average of the three preceding years:—a circumstance which your Committee point out to the attention of the House, as leading them to the foundation which they propose to assume for their Estimate of the probable produce of future years.

The following is the general Abstract of this comparison, deduced from the several Accounts.

Your Committee being fully impressed with the belief, that the unfavourable returns of the Revenue in the year 1816, are essentially referable to the general distresses of the Country, are necessarily led to the conclusion, that according as these distresses may be removed by the recovery of trade and agriculture, from the shock occasioned by the sudden change in the money value of commodities, and in proportion as the industry of the labouring classes may receive relief from more extended or more productive employment, coupled with the blessing of a more favourable season than the last;—in the same proportion and degree may it be confidently expected, that the public Revenue of the Country will return to its average rate of productiveness.

They wish, however, to be clearly understood as not stating a confident opinion that the estimate thus framed, will be realized within the present year. For although they see, on the one hand, reason to expect that the receipts of the Exchequer may (when the change which they anticipate takes place) be swelled, in the first instance, somewhat beyond the actual increase of the consumption, by the replenishment in the hands of dealers, of the average stocks of their respective trades, which stocks your Committee have reason to believe have been greatly reduced; yet, considering how much of the year must elapse before the relief to be expected from the ensuing harvest can be felt, together with other circumstances which may operate to delay the expected improvement, they deem it safer to present a less sanguine view, and to assume, as will appear in the detailed statement which follows, that even with the aid of the arrears of the property-tax, to the amount of 2,800,000*l.*, the receipts of the present and the next year may not exceed the limits of their estimate.

Your Committee, proceeding upon this foundation, have therefore called for accounts from each branch of the Revenue, “of the total net produce paid into the Exchequer in the years 1815 and 1816, of the Taxes and Duties existing on the 5th January, 1817, shewing the average of the last two years; together with an addition by estimate, for the amount of any duties which may not have been in full operation during the whole of the two years,” the result of which is as follows:

In this statement your Committee have not inserted, for the reason above-mentioned, the sums remaining to be received upon the Assessments of the Property Tax, which will, however, come in aid of the Consolidated Fund in the present and the next year, or be otherwise applicable, according to the disposal of Parliament. The amount computed to have been outstanding under this head, on the 5th January, 1817, was 2,800,000.

Having thus estimated the probable Income, your Committee proceed to state the probable Expenditure in the years 1817 and 1818, which they propose to divide under the following heads :

Interest and Management of the Public Debt of the United Kingdom, unredeemed	29,403,464	28,751,093
Sinking Fund, and Interest on Debt redeemed payable to the Commissioners for the redemption of the National Debt	14,134,443	14,724,614
Total charge for Account of the Funded Debt	43,537,907	43,475,707
Civil List of the United Kingdom	1,235,692	1,235,692
Pensions by special Acts of Parliament, Allowances, Expenses of the Mint, Courts of Justice, and other Miscellaneous Charges upon the Consolidated Fund	779,657	779,657
Interest upon Treasury Bills in Ireland charged upon the Consolidated Fund	265,831	23,654
Russian Loan in Holland	121,965	121,965
Making the whole of the Annual Charge upon the Consolidated Fund	£45,940,452	45,636,675

With these Charges upon the Consolidated Fund should be classed, as your Committee conceive, the Interest and Sinking Fund annually voted to defray the Charge of the Unfunded Debt. Having accordingly called for an estimate of the same, they find it to be for the present year, 1,900,000*l.* for the Interest, and 1,330,000*l.* for the Sinking Fund, making together 2,330,000*l.*, which Sum they therefore take as the probable amount in each of the two years because any diminution under this head, except so far as may be derived from a reduction of Interest, would occasion a nearly corresponding addition to the charge of the Funded Debt.

The next part of the Expenditure which your Committee have to consider, is the Supply annually granted for the Public Service, under the Heads of Army, Navy, Ordnance, and Miscellaneous Charges :—with respect to which your Committee have proceeded upon the Estimates for those several Services which are now before the House for the present year;—and with respect to such Supplies as are not yet voted and do not usually come before the House by previous estimates, upon the information which they have received from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, one of the Members of your Committee. But as it is obvious that some of the expenses comprised in the estimates for the year 1817, will not recur in future years, and that others will gradually diminish (independently of any reductions which your Committee trust it may be found consistent with the Public Interest to make in the establishments which form the principal subjects of these Estimates) your Committee have called upon the several Departments to distinguish the Expenses which will terminate in the present year; and they now present their Estimate of the annual Supplies for the years 1817 and 1818, accordingly, as follows:

ARMY

Add PERMANENT CHARGES CHARGE of Unfunded Debt.

9,080,000	8,500,000
7,646,000*	6,000,000
1,221,300	1,150,000
1,700,000	1,700,000
19,647,300	17,350,000
45,940,432	45,636,675
67,817,752	65,216,675

Your Committee are aware that there are Expenses not included in the Estimates for the present year, which must occur, if not in the next, some of them certainly, and others probably, in future years;—such as the charge of embodying and training the Regular Militia, in the Army Estimates; and the Grants for augmenting small Livings, and for building Churches, which have been postponed in the Miscellaneous Services of the present year: But they are induced to hope that reductions under other heads of our Establishments, equivalent to these Expenses, will be effected by the vigilant economy of the Government; and they therefore make no allowance for them in these statements.

It now only remains for them to compare the Income with the Expenditure, and to state the result.

The probable average Income in the years 1817 and 1818, according to the foregoing Estimate, is 52,505,364*l.*, which being deducted from the estimated totals of the Expenditure in each of those years, it would appear that there would remain to be provided by extraordinary resources, to make good the difference between the total Income and Expenditure, in the year 1817, 15,312,388*l.*;† and in the year 1818, 12,711,311*l.* independently of any addition to the annual charge, by reason of new debt which may be created in either of those years.

To this statement, your Committee have to add, that in the former of these years, the sums to be applied (forming part of the above general Expenditure) for the reduction of debt, is 14,515,473*l.*;‡ and, that in the latter, it may be estimated to be 15,104,117*l.*: §—by which it will appear, that in the latter year, the debt to be redeemed would exceed the debt to be probably incurred, by the sum of 2,392,808*l.*||

In addition to this surplus of Income applicable towards the diminution of the debt, your Committee feel warranted by the improved and apparently improving state of the Public Credit, and consequent increased value of the Public Securities, in directing the attention of the House to the probability of a reduction, at no distant period, of the interest on a part of the Funded Debt;—the result of which, besides the incidental encouragement which every description of productive industry and commercial enterprise could not fail to find, in the facility of borrowing upon advantageous terms, would be a very considerable saving in the permanent charge of the National Debt.

Your Committee do not think it necessary to submit any prospective calculations upon this subject; but if, by the continued blessings of Peace, and a system of persevering Economy, the Public Credit of the Country, aided by the uninterrupted operation of the Sinking Fund, should attain to the point at which it stood in 1792, your Committee observe with satisfaction, that a diminution of charge might be effected by the reduction of Interest alone, which would be an annual saving of between two and three Million sterling. Looking forward to this event, as the resource which promises the greatest and most substantial relief to our Finances, and feeling that in its attainment the Country would find at once the evidence of existing ease and the pledge of growing prosperity, Your Committee cannot better conclude this Report, than by expressing their anxious hope that nothing will arise either in the state of our foreign relations, or in the

* This Sum includes 1,200,000*l.* for reduction of Navy and Transport Debt, and 460,000*l.*, due to the East India Company, for Remp furnished to the Navy.

* The following is the Report of the Select Committee on Flax. (See pages 1059, 1245 (Mr. Curwen's Speech) and 1252.) "Your Committee, have considered the Petition of Messrs. Hill and Bundy, on their improved method of preparing Flax and Hemp, in a dry state, from the stem, without undergoing the former process of water-steeping or dew-rotting.—Your Committee received satisfactory proof, that the preparing Flax and Hemp, in a dry state, for Spinning, answered most completely, and was likely to prove a great and valuable improvement both to the grower and manufacturer; the cost of preparing being less; avoiding the risk of steeping, which is considerable; a great saving also in time and material.—It was proved also to your Committee, that the strength and quality of Cloth manufactured from Flax thus prepared, are much superior to that produced from Flax which has been water-steeped or dew-rotted.—Your Committee are fully impressed with the great national advantages likely to result from this discovery, by which it would appear, that a saving in the proportion of ninety to thirty-three would be obtained on the annual growth of Flax in the Empire, computed at 120,000 Acres, affording an increase of employment to many thousands, and an augmentation of the national wealth to the amount of many millions, as will more fully appear by reference to the evidence in corroboration of the allegations set forth by the said Petitioners.—It appeared also in evidence before your Committee, that the Flax prepared by Messrs. Hill and Bundy's Machines, was superior to any dew-rotted Flax; and that large orders had already been given for Flax thus prepared by the house of Messrs. Benyon and Co. at Leeds, one of the most considerable manufacturers of Flax in the Kingdom.—Your Committee proceeded also to the consideration of the Petition of James Lee, but did not feel themselves competent to go into any examination of the allegations stating an infringement of Mr. Lee's Patent. As far as the evidence before the Committee was adduced, it did not seem to justify such an assumption. This, however, is a question for a Court of Law.—Evidence on the part of Mr. Lee was produced to your Committee, to shew Mr. Lee's Machines were in use in various Workhouses in different parts of the Kingdom; that Mr. Lee's manner of preparing Flax was without water-steeping or dew-rotting; and affords additional proof of the great advantages of the practice.—Your Committee must also call the attention of the House to the essential benefit that will be derived to the Cultivators of Flax, from the quantity of valuable Food for Cattle obtained from the new method of preparing Flax. It has been given in proof, that the Boon or outer Coat of Flax, contains one-sixth of the Gluten of Oats.

ARMY.

NAVY.

The effective strength of the British Army at home and abroad, exclusive of artillery, on the 25th April, 1817, was as follows:—

Officers	7,623
Serjeants	8,811
Trumpeters or drummers	3,561
Farriers	338
Rank and file	154,699

Total 155,032

Making the grand total of the army 166,865

In the above statement the Cape of Good Hope regiment, the Ceylonese regiments, and black pioneers, are not included, as they are paid by the colonies in which they are serving. These troops consist of 201 officers, 239 serjeants, 86 drummers, and 3,854 rank and file*.

* The following is an extract of a letter addressed from the Horse Guards, some time since, to the Colonels of the Army, and which, although marked "Confidential," there can be no impropriety in giving to the public, recommending, as it does, a line of conduct so agreeable to humanity and judgment:—

"The Commander-in-Chief is confident that the Officers of the Army are universally actuated by a spirit of justice, and impressed with those sentiments of kindness and regard towards their men, which they on so many occasions have proved themselves to deserve; but his Royal Highness has reason to apprehend, that in many instances sufficient attention has not been paid to the PREVENTION OF CRIMES. The timely interference of the officer, his personal intercourse and acquaintance with his men, (which attentions are sure to be repaid by the soldier's confidence and attachment), and above all his personal example, are the only efficacious means of preventing military offences; and the Commander-in-Chief has no hesitation in declaring, that the maintenance of strict discipline without severity of punishment, and the support and encouragement of an ardent military spirit in a corps, without licentiousness, are the criteria by which his Royal Highness will be very much guided in forming an opinion of the talents, abilities, and merit of the officers to whom the command of the different regiments and corps of the army are confided. (Signed) H. CALVERT."

The REPORT of the NATIONAL VACCINE ESTABLISHMENT, for the Year 1816, addressed to Lord Viscount Sidmouth. (See pages 1350-1379.)

National Vaccine Establishment, Leicester Square, May 15, 1817.

MY LORD.—We have the honour to report to your lordship, that in the course of the last year, a considerable augmentation has occurred in the number of persons Vaccinated within the Bills of Mortality, by the Surgeons of this Establishment; the amount at the ordinary and extraordinary stations having been 7,771; and 44,376 charges of Vaccine Lymph have been distributed from these stations. We have also to report from the Statements of our extraordinary and corresponding Vaccinators, that 47,874 persons have been Vaccinated in various parts of the kingdom, 31,689 of whom are distinctly stated to have undergone Vaccination from January to December, 1816; of the remaining 16,185, a large proportion were Vaccinated during the year, but not all of them, as a few of our corresponding Vaccinators, in distant parts of the country, have made their reports to us for a succession of years collectively.

The Board has made a considerable addition to the number of extraordinary and corresponding Vaccinators in different parts of Great Britain and Ireland, and in the West Indies, by which means the benefits of Vaccination are extended under its immediate direction. A Diploma has been formed, by order of the Board, which we have conferred on all those gentlemen employed by us in Vaccination.

The great importance of affording to practitioners, at a distance from the Metropolis, the opportunity of an immediate and constant supply of Lymph, is strikingly apparent, from their inability to keep up such a regular succession of patients, as would at all times furnish them with it; and it is this Board principally which can supply the renewed demand.

In the case also of Small Pox breaking out in any particular district, it is of the utmost consequence that no time should be lost in procuring Vaccine Lymph, in order to stop the destructive ravages of that disease: to forward so desirable an object, the utmost facility is afforded by this Board.

As a proof of the progress of Vaccination in this country, the Board has to notice the establishment of a Royal Vaccine Institution in the counties of Bucks, Berks, and Somerset. Vaccination is also regularly practised at several Provincial Hospitals and Dispensaries.

We have the pleasure of again acknowledging the obligations we owe to several disinterested individuals, particularly to the Reverend Mr. Reid, of Leckhamstead, Bucks, who continues to support the cause with so much zeal, that there remains scarcely an individual in his neighbourhood, who has not undergone Vaccination.

In the Report made by the Board in the last Session, it was stated, that no instance of Small Pox had occurred at Aberystwith, or at Pawtry. We have the additional satisfaction to state, that at East Dereham that disease has not been known for many years. At Kingston in Surrey, and its neighbourhood, it has not made any progress for eleven years. We have a letter from Slaithwaite, near Huddersfield, stating that that neighbourhood has been kept entirely free from Small Pox for nine years past; and from Newtown, Llanavaddy, (Londonderry,) we have information, that it is rarely heard of in that part of the country.

It may not be unworthy of remark, that in the Second Weekly Bill of Mortality for September last, not a death is mentioned as having been occasioned by the Small Pox,—a circumstance which has not happened for two centuries: though we have even now to lament, that the number of deaths by that disease, within the Bills of Mortality during the last year, amounts to 653.

We feel it our duty to state that, in the town of Ulverston, during the spring of last year, various instances occurred of patients having had the Small Pox after they had been Vaccinated; for the most part, however, it was that mitigated form of the disease which marks the previous Vaccination: in all the cases it was mild, and in no instance fatal. The occurrence of these failures was confined to a very limited district; and as such events have since ceased, although great numbers of other individuals, previously Vaccinated, were exposed to the virulose contagion, we are of opinion, that the failures were owing to the employment of Lymph in succession from a vesicle, which had not gone through its stages with perfect regularity; and that even the imperfect Vaccine Vesicle thus produced, has very generally the power of rendering the human frame susceptible of none but the mitigated form of Small Pox. A few cases of similar failures have been reported, and most of these in London have been visited by the Director of this Establishment, who states them to have arisen from imperfect Vaccination.

That failures very rarely occur when Vaccination is well conducted, the registers from our different stations abundantly prove. The Summary at present is, that since the foundation of this Establishment in the year 1809, there have been Vaccinated in our Stations within the Bills of Mortality, 34,369 persons. Of which number it has hitherto been intimated that only 400 had the Small Pox; forming one failure in 8,592 cases. It is not improbable that, in the same number of persons, an equal or greater proportion might have had the Small Pox twice; and it should not be forgotten that when 34,369 persons were inoculated with the Small Pox, as the proportion of deaths in good practice amounted, by different estimates, to one in two or three hundred, between 114 and 171 persons would have perished, and the effects of the diseases with which many others would have been afflicted, as the consequence of the previous disease would have been most calamitous.

The intelligence with which we have been furnished from Foreign Countries, affords a very pleasing picture of the continued advances made in Vaccination.

From the Report of the Central Committee at Paris, it appears that in 72 Departments, 251,116 persons have been Vaccinated in the preceding year, constituting more than one-third of the births.

By the favour of Count Fernan Nunez, Ambassador from H. M. Catholic Majesty, letters have been received from Dr. Francisco Xavier de Balmis, the Court Physician at Madrid. A succinct account is given of the expedition of this enterprising Physician, who was deputed by his Sovereign, and disseminated the blessings of Vaccination through the whole of South America, by means of Vaccine Lymph, supplied from England. He then embarked on the Pacific Ocean, sailed to the Phillipine Islands, and returned by Canton and Madeira, having circumnavigated the Globe for the most benevolent purpose. He is now occupied in restoring the practice throughout Spain, where, owing to the late political events, it had fallen into neglect.

H. M. Faithful Majesty at the Brazils, has been pleased to transmit thanks to Mr. Edwards, a corresponding member of this Establishment, for introducing Vaccination into Rio de Janeiro, and a Vaccine Institution is founded by his Majesty in that city.

The Baron Von Fahrenberg has transmitted a review of the progress of Vaccination in the Grand Duchy of Baden, with Lymph, supplied by this Board. From this communication we learn that Vaccination is now established by law throughout the territories of the Grand Duke.

Governor Raffles has communicated that he successfully introduced Vaccination into Java, and that no essential prejudice opposes it in that country, where the native priests have become expert Vaccinators, and the lower orders are vaccinated as a measure of police.

From Canton, Dr. Alexander Pearson, Surgeon to the Factory of the East India Company, writes that Vaccination is very favourably received there, and is extended throughout the whole Province of Canton. He has sent us a Chinese Treatise on Vaccination, in the original, together with a Translation, by Sir George Staunton.

A second remarkable letter has also been received from the Government of Hayti, dated November 18, 1816.—“Le Roi à Monsieur James Moore, Directeur, &c.”—It expresses that the greatest success has attended Vaccination, with the Lymph supplied from this Board; and it states,—“Que la Vaccine est dans ce moment repandue dans le Royaume, et nous eprouvons déjà les precieux bienfaits qui en resultent; la Petite Vérole semble avoir fui de nos climats.”

It appears, then, that Vaccination is progressive in every part of the World, is approved of by all enlightened men, and encouraged by every Government. The inestimable advantages, however, thus held out, are unfortunately, in some degree, counteracted, even by some Medical Practitioners, who obstinately continue to inoculate, and sanction the exposure of their patients in public. And in some counties where the Medical gentlemen have actively opposed Inoculation, the mischief is widely extended by illiterate and itinerant Inoculators, who travel through the country, and for a trifling profit to themselves, diffuse the Varolous Infection.

Of such persons, repeated information has been transmitted to the Board, who have to regret their inability to inflict on them the punishment they deserve; we have, however, recommended to the parties complaining of such injurious practices, to adopt those legal remedies, which are, by means of the Prosecutions instituted by this Board, now known to exist for their suppression; and we have warned the aggressors that they subject themselves to be indicted for a Criminal Offence.

(Signed)—J. LATHAM, (President of the Royal College of Physicians)—WILLIAM NORRIS, (Master of the Royal College of Surgeons)—ARTHUR DANIEL STONE, GEORGE GILBERT CURREY, A. BAIN, JAMES TATTERSALL, (Censors of the Royal College of Physicians)—JAMES EARLE, P. CHANDLER, (Governors of the Royal College of Surgeons)—By Order of the Board, JAMES HERVEY, M. D. Registrar.

AN APPENDIX to the REPORT, contains the following Declaration :

In consequence of the reported failure of Vaccination in the parish of St. Osyth, (Essex), We, the under-mentioned Medical gentlemen, on the recommendation of the Rev. Archdeacon Jefferson, and the Overseers of the same parish, have fully and deliberately, this day, investigated the matter, and beg, for the satisfaction of the Public at large, to make the following Declaration :

We consider that the Small Pox has, in very few instances, supervened to Vaccination; but that in those instances, we are of opinion that Vaccination, most probably, had not been perfectly introduced into the system, owing simply to the nature and progress of the disease not having been at that time thoroughly understood.

In the remainder of the cases we have witnessed, we are of opinion, that although some cutaneous Eruptions had taken place, they were by no means decidedly Varolous, and if any of them did put on that appearance, they were of a mild and transient nature.

We therefore wish to Declare, that we shall feel anxious to continue to prosecute Vaccination, considering it one of the most valuable discoveries to Society.

JAMES MOORE, Esquire, Director of the National Vaccine Establishment, accompanied us during this investigation, and is precisely of the same opinion with us, and is to report the particulars to the Institution upon his return to London.

(Signed) GEORGE ROGERS, (of Thimtree.)—ROGER NUNN, (of Colchester.)—MAURICE MASON, (of St. Osyth.)—THOMAS OSMOND, (of Thorpe.)—ROBERT MARTIN, (of St. Osyth.)—St. Osyth, May 14, 1817.

Mr. MOORE, in his Report on these cases states, that,—“The incidents were, in fact, not of a novel description, as examples have before been occasionally communicated to the Board, of some persons who had been Vaccinated according to the original method, being subsequently affected with the Small Pox, though usually in a very mitigated form. But such occurrences are most uncommon among those who have been Vaccinated according to the last improved plan of practice, promulgated by the Board. Some very rare instances of failures in Vaccinations, as exceptions to a general law, may, however, be expected, as long as the Small Pox is prevalent; since it has been fully ascertained that, when the air is strongly impregnated with the infectious vapour of the Small Pox, some of those who have once had this disease, are attacked a second time.”

“Upon the whole, it must be gratifying to the Board to find, that at St. Osyth, though some of the inhabitants had been Vaccinated by ladies, and others by an itinerant Quack, yet none died of Small Pox during this epidemic, except a portion of those who were not Vaccinated.”

The Irish and Portuguese payments for the interest on their respective debts, payable in England, are excluded from this statement; and the War Taxes appropriated to the interest of loans charged on them, are not included in the Consolidated Fund, but under the head of War Taxes, to the quarter ended 5th July, 1816, inclusive, from which period certain War Duties of Customs being made perpetual by Act 56 Geo. 3. cap. 29, are included under the head of Consolidated Customs*.

* EXPLANATION.—The following statement will more clearly shew the produce of the Revenue in the quarters ended on the 10th days of October, 1816, and 1817.

CUSTOMS.
Consolidated	£1,499,283	1,830,180

	14,502,296	11,523,548
	Oct. 10, 1816.	Oct. 10, 1817.
Amount of Revenue	£14,502,296	11,523,548
Deduct amount of War Duty on Malt	£517,000
Ditto Property Tax	2,960,576
	3,477,576
	11,024,720
Deduct Arrears of Property Tax and Malt Duty		419,072
		11,104,476
Net Revenue received in the Quarter ending Oct. 10, 1817		11,104,476
Ditto 1816		11,024,720
Increase as compared with 1816		79,756
By this account, then, it appears, that the increase in the Customs in the last quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter, amounts to £664,091.
The Excise comparison presents a different result; but the cause is not likely to be permanent.
The Stamps in the two last quarters, particularly the last, afford an excess beyond the corresponding quarters.
The Post Office revenue has fallen off, but the last quarter is higher than either of the three preceding quarters.
The Assessed Taxes for the three last quarters exceed the same Taxes in the three corresponding quarters.
The Land Taxes are more productive in each of the four last quarters than in the four corresponding quarters.
The total of the Permanent and Annual Duties for the last four quarters exceeds the total of the four preceding quarters by above 1,200,000 l. viz.:—
Total of 1816		£40,866,775
1817		42,159,665

OFFICES ABOUT TO BE REGULATED, &c.

The total Consolidated Fund for the same period is, for 1816 . . .	£38,219,757
1817 . . .	38,413,523
Leaving an excess in favour of 1817, of . . .	193,766
The total War Taxes for 1816 were	£19,272,088
1817	5,281,954
Against 1817	13,990,134

But this falling-off is occasioned by the repeal of the War Excise Duty on Malt, and the Property Tax. Thus the difference between the whole produce of the Revenue for the year is as follows:—

1817	47,441,619

or 483,895*l.* more than the difference (viz. 12,213,349*l.*) between the produce of the War Excise Duty and the Property-tax in 1816 and 1817.

OFFICES ABOUT TO BE REGULATED OR ABOLISHED.

Among the Papers recently printed in pursuance of an order of the House of Commons, are official returns of the total number of persons holding situations or employments in certain offices in England, Scotland, and Ireland, about to be regulated or abolished, specifying the aggregate number to be employed in each office respectively, together with the authority under which they were appointed, and the amount of their respective salaries and emoluments, for the year ending the 5th of January, 1817. From those documents it appears, that the salaries of officers in England and Scotland are inconsiderable, compared with the incomes of clerks, and deputies of clerks, in Ireland. The following items are extracted from the official returns:—

PROTHONOTARY in the Court of Common Pleas:—The Hon. Thos. Knox and the Hon. Vesey Knox, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Ireland;

Salary	7 10 0

Ditto as Filacer	698 13 6
Salary	7 10 0

£10,916 14 5

DEPUTIES.—Robert Hamilton, and Rowley Heyland, appointed by Deputation, under the hands and seals of the said patentees.—No salary.

Amount arising from fees	£4,505 5 4

Net Annual Amount of each 2,252 12 8

Nine principal Clerks from £2,050 down to £500 a-year.

Patent Registrar of the Court of Chancery. Viscount Avonmore, appointed by patent for life. Net annual emoluments, as far as can be made out £3,483 18 10

Auditor of the Exchequer in England a-year 4,000 0 0

This is the only considerable salary in the Scotch offices mentioned in the returns. All the others are under 1,500*l.* a-year.

A List of all the Public (General) Acts passed in the Fifth Session of the Fifth Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.—57 Geo. III. 1817.

IN framing this List, the Editor has arranged the Acts under different heads, according to the nature of the subject to which they relate. By this means, the Reader will be enabled to find any particular Statute he may want with greater facility. The figures placed at the end of each Act, denote the Chapter of that Act in the Statute Book. The whole number of Public General Acts passed during the Session amounted to 132; in addition to which there were also passed 64 Local and Personal Acts, declared public, and to be judicially noticed; 38 Private Acts, printed by the King's Printer, and whereof the printed Copies may be given in evidence; and 64 Private Acts, not printed.

The following are the heads under which the Public General Acts are here arranged:—

Arrests.	Labourers.
Charity and Friendly Societies.	Landlord and Tenant.
Clergy.	Lunatics.

VII. ADDENDA.

I. LUCIEN BUONAPARTE.

— " PARIS, —

" PROTOCOL OF THE CONFERENCE OF THE 18th OF MARCH.

" Present—The Minister of Austria, Duke de Richelieu, Duke of Wellington, Sir Charles Stuart, the Prussian Minister, the Minister of Russia.

" The conference having been opened this day with their Excellencies the Dukes of Richelieu and Wellington, to take into consideration the demand made by Lucien Buonaparte for passports to conduct one of his sons to the United States, and the Austrian Minister having again laid down the three questions proposed at the Protocol of the 2d instant, relative to the same object, it has been agreed—

" 1. That North America having received a great number of mal-contents and French refugees, the presence of Lucien Buonaparte in the United States would be still more dangerous than it is in Europe, where he can be better watched, and that in consequence it is to be desired that the passports he has asked for should be refused.

" 2. That in order to deprive him of all plausible motives for soliciting the said passports, it would be equally desirable to refuse them to his son Charles, whose journey seems to be only a pretext for the plans of the father.

" 3. That the news received by different means, and from different countries, particularly from Naples, leave no doubt of the intrigues and dangerous relations which Lucien Buonaparte keeps up in Italy; and considering that Rome is perhaps of all cities that in which superintendence is the most difficult to be exercised, and is exercised with less severity, and that he may, notwithstanding the refusal of passports, find means of deceiving the vigilance of the Roman Government, and of escaping to proceed to America, it would be desirable that another abode be assigned him than Rome and the Roman States, by the high Allied Powers, and that he should be farther removed from the coasts, in order to render the plans of escape which he may mediate more difficult.

" This opinion being common to all the Members of the Conference, it has been resolved to consign it in the Protocol of the day, in order that it may be made known to the four Courts, and may produce a determination on their part upon this subject.

(Signed) " VINCENT. RICHELIEU. WELLINGTON. C. STUART. GOLTZ. POZZO DI BORGOH."

II. BILL TO SUSPEND THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.

PROTEST.

ON THE MOTION THAT THE CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL BE PUT OFF FOR THREE MONTHS BEING NEGATIVED.—See page 416.

DISSENTIENT,—Because we concur entirely in the reasons stated in the Protest entered against the second reading of the said Bill on the 24th February last, and because the delay that has taken place since the Bill has been hurried through this House, contrary to its established Forms and Standing Orders (in consequence of which unbecoming haste the amendments have been found necessary), has confirmed and increased our conviction that this measure, which necessity alone can justify, is without any such justification.

III. RIGHT OF MAGISTRATES TO VISIT STATE PRISONERS.

In a note, page 1450, it is stated, that this question had been practically settled by his Majesty's Justices of the Peace of the County of Berks. It appears, however, that the Keeper of the County Gaol at Reading has again refused to admit one of the Magistrates into certain parts of the Gaol, in consequence of which the Magistrates have passed the following Resolutions on the subject:—

" BERKSHIRE, TO WIT.—At the General Quarter Sessions of the peace, of our Sovereign Lord the King, holden at Abingdon, on Tuesday, the 14th day of October, 1817;

" CHARLES DUNDAS, Esq. in the Chair:

" The following letter to the Chairman was read:—

" SIR,—In pursuance of the provisions of the 31st of Geo. 3, c. 46, I beg leave to report to the Court of Quarter Sessions, that in spite of the provisions of that act, and the assurance given to this Court at a former sitting, Mr. Eaststaff, the Governor of the Bridewell and Penitentiary house, at Reading, and Gaoler of the County Gaol, has again, viz. on Monday the 6th instant, refused to admit me into certain parts of the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, or County Gaol, or to visit certain prisoners therein confined, I trust the Court will take effectual measures to prevent the future recurrence of this abuse.

" I am, Sir, your faithful humble servant,

" FOLKESTONE,

" Justice of the Peace for the County of Berks."

" Coleshill-house, Oct. 13, 1817."

" This Court, upon hearing the statement of Lord Viscount Folkestone, resolved, " 1st. That George Ernest Eaststaff, in disobeying the order of the last sessions, and in refusing to admit into certain parts of the Bridewell or Penitentiary-house, or County Gaol, a Justice of the Peace for the county, when required so to do, has been guilty of a breach of his duty.

" 2d. That the said G. E. Eaststaff be suspended from his office of Governor of the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, till after the indictment found against him for the said offence shall have been tried at law.

" 3d. That during such suspension he be not allowed to reside in the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house, nor receive any salary or emolument as Governor of the same.

" 4th. That the Clerk of the Peace do forthwith inform the High Sheriff that the said G. E. Eaststaff has been so suspended.

" 5th. That John Walker, the present keeper of the Bridewell at Abingdon, be appointed to fill the office of Governor of the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house at Reading, during the time that the said G. E. Eaststaff shall be suspended from his office.

" 6th. That the said John Walker be informed, that the Act of Parliament, 31 G. 3. c. 46, requires him to admit any Justice of the Peace for this County to enter into and examine the same, whenever he thinks fit, though the said Justice be not a visitor; and he be required to give assurances to this Court that he will act accordingly.

" 7th. That the Clerk of the Peace do inform the High Sheriff of the appointment of John Walker to be Governor, pro tempore, of the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house at Reading.

" 8th. That William Mattison, turnkey of the Abingdon Bridewell, be appointed keeper of the said Bridewell, at Abingdon, during the absence of John Walker.

" 9th. That G. E. Eaststaff have three weeks from this day allowed him to reconduct the prisoners to Reading, and to remove from his lodgings in the Bridewell and Penitentiary-house there."

IV. TRIALS FOR HIGH TREASON AT DERBY.

In a note, page 1671, it is stated, that a Special Commission had been issued for the trial of the persons concerned in riotous proceedings in Derbyshire. The Court, consisting of the Chief Baron RICHARDS, Mr. Justice DALLAS, Mr. Justice ABBOT, and Mr. Justice HOLROYD, assembled at Derby on the 15th of October, and thirty-five persons having been arraigned on the same indictment, the Attorney General proceeded to try them separately. Jeremiah Brandreth was put to the Bar. The evidence against him proved, that he and about twenty others met openly, and in the presence of constables, at the White Horse, in Pentridge, on the 8th of June: he said there was no good to be done except by an overthrow of Government, and it was settled that they were to assemble the next night, at dusk, and proceed to Nottingham Forest to meet a large party there, and to take the town. Brandreth was called the Nottingham Captain: he told them all the country would rise at the same time, and repeated these verses—

" Every man his skill must try,
He must turn out, and not deny;
No bloody soldier must he dread,
He must turn out, and fight for bread;
The time is come, you plainly see,
When Government opposed must be."

He said, he wanted a barrel of gunpowder to teach the men how to make cartridges; there were plenty of churches on the road, and they could get lead from them. George Weightman was to go to Nottingham to see how matters went on: money was collected in the room for his journey: each man subscribed sixpence.

On the night of the 9th of June, Brandreth and his party, armed with guns and pikes, went to several houses in Pentridge, and demanded men and arms. Mrs. Hepworth told them, she would not part with either, upon which Brandreth fired in at a broken window, and shot Robert Walters, a servant, who died soon after of his wounds. The party, then about 60 strong, proceeded to Mr. Booth's, and took a pony out of the yard, which George Weightman mounted, and rode to Nottingham. The cry was, " Nottingham, roast beef, and a fresh Government." The party, under the command of the prisoner, marched forward on the road to Ripley, compelling others to join them, assigning as a reason for their movements, that " they wanted a bigger loaf, and the times altered." They then proceeded to Codner, stopped at a public-house, and roused the family. Samuel Hunt, Joseph Turner, and Edward Turner, then came up with 40 or 50 men. The prisoner gave orders to the landlord to make out his bill of the refreshment they had had, which amounted to 28s., and stated that he would see him paid. At this house Bacon made a speech, and said, " that Government had robbed and plundered every thing—that this was the last shift—and they must fight or starve." They then marched on to a farm-yard at a little distance; thence they went on towards Nottingham, being joined in their way by 60 or 70 more from Swanwick, and stopped at Langley mill, where they were met by George Weightman on Booth's pony. Prisoner then went up and asked him how all things were going on at Nottingham. He answered that all was going on well; the town had been taken; the soldiers would not leave their barracks, and therefore that the party should march onwards. When they arrived at Eastwood, James Barnes said, that it would soon be over; for that by a letter he had seen yesterday, the key of the Tower of London would be given up to the Hampden Club party, if they were not already. At Eastwood the men were much disordered, and Brandreth desired them to fall again into their ranks: some refused; others afterwards threw away their arms, and deserted; and, finally, the party was much reduced in number.

[Several pikes with spear-heads, of rough workmanship, and about 84lb. weight of bullets were produced in Court. The bullets were partly in a stocking, and partly in a bag.]

These facts were attested by Anthony Martin, and Shirley Asbury, two special constables, who spoke to the conversation at the public-house in Pentridge; and by a great many witnesses, whose houses were attacked in the route from Pentridge to Nottingham.

LAUNCELOT ROLLESTON, Esq. a Magistrate of the County of Nottingham, being examined, deposed as follows :—“ In consequence of the alarm excited on the 9th of June last, he attended at the town of Nottingham : he found it in a very agitated state ; groups of people were collected in various places, and there was a general apprehension in the town. On the morning of the 10th, he went on the road towards Eastwood on horseback. At a village within a mile of Eastwood, the people were very much alarmed, and most of them out of their houses. The military were in their barracks. Witness proceeded till he came within a quarter of a mile of Eastwood ; he then met a considerable body of men armed with pikes. He returned to Nottingham—gave information of what he had seen to two magistrates, Mr. Munday and Mr. Kirby ; and procuring eighteen dragoons, commanded by Captain Phillips, proceeded with them towards Eastwood again. When they had got to Kimberley, about two miles short of Eastwood and four from Nottingham, the people told them that the mob, hearing of the approach of the soldiery, had dispersed. They proceeded on the road, and found a great number of pikes and guns which had been thrown away. Within a mile of Eastwood witness saw a party retreating on the left, and he and a dragoon followed them. Captain Phillips went on after the general body. Those whom witness went after were thirty or forty in number : he secured two or three ; they had thrown away their arms. He then followed Captain Phillips. They came up to the main body at Langley mill. They were at that time dispersed, and the dragoons were pursuing them in all directions. Thirty were taken and brought to Nottingham. Witness afterwards pursued and took Edward Moore. After this, peace and quietness were restored to the town of Nottingham.”

Captain PHILLIPS, of the 15th Hussars, examined.—“ On Monday, the 9th of June last, he was stationed with a detachment of his regiment, at Nottingham Barracks. Towards the evening there appeared bustle and disturbance in the streets. About ten, a detachment of military was sent for ; on their arrival the crowd dispersed. The military were on the alert all night.—About half-past 6 in the morning witness was called on by Mr. Munday and Mr. Rolleston, and went with a detachment of his corps towards Eastwood. When they got near Langley, they saw about sixty men armed. As witness and his party came up, he saw a man holding out his arm as if desirous of forming a line ; but the mob paid no attention to him ; they fled in all directions, throwing away their arms. On the way back, witness met the High Sheriff and the yeomanry coming in pursuit of the rebels.”

This was the case on the part of the prosecution.—The only witness called for the prisoner was John Hazard, overseer of the town of Welford. He stated, that he knew the prisoner. He was a frame-worker : he and his family were poor people, and had had relief from the parish.

The counsel for the prisoner contended, that there was no circumstance, but that of his conduct at the Pentridge public-house on the Sunday morning, which at all applied to the proof of a treasonable design. The prisoner was stated to have talked about rising and marching to Nottingham, and to have exhibited a map, on which the route was pointed out, to a few starving labourers, in a public place, and on the most public day of the week. This was the whole of the direct evidence to affect the prisoner with being party to a traitorous conspiracy. No attempt was made to shew who were the other conspirators. Beef and ale, not the overthrow of the Constitution, appeared to have been in the contemplation of these men. The learned gentlemen expressed their deep regret, that the prisoner had been first selected for trial upon this heavy charge, connected as his particular case was with a most painful occurrence. If the parties had been guilty of riot, and of theft, let them be tried for misdemeanour and felony, not on the statute of Edward the Third. Upon the letter of that statute, by which alone this question of treason must be determined, they submitted, with confidence, that the Jury were bound to acquit the prisoner of this charge.

The CHIEF BARON summed up the evidence, and explained the law in reference to the case. He remarked, that the atrocious murder which took place was not treason ; but it was for the Jury to say what was the object of such conduct. Was it for a general and public, or a private and individual purpose ? That there was an insurrection was clear. It was equally clear that the persons assembled were armed. There was, then, force and violence. It was declared from time to time, that there could be no good without an overturn of the Government, &c. If the jury believed this evidence, they were bound to find the prisoner guilty.

The Jury retired, and in 20 minutes returned with a verdict—Guilty of High Treason.

William Turner, Isaac Ludlam the elder, and George Weightman, were then severally tried, and found Guilty. The last prisoner was strongly recommended to mercy, on account of his youth, and the humanity which he had evinced.

Thirty-five persons were originally brought up for trial. Of these, twelve were discharged, the Attorney-General having declined to prosecute, and the Jury having in consequence found them Not Guilty.

The Counsel for the remaining nineteen prisoners then proposed to the Attorney-General, that they would withdraw their plea of Not Guilty, if mercy should be extended to them. This proposition was acceded to. Judgment of death was then passed upon the whole of the prisoners ; but it is understood that the nineteen who pleaded guilty will certainly have their sentence commuted, and that Weightman will not be executed.
